by the National Aeronautical Association. She holds the third transport license granted to an American woman. She was the first woman to pilot a plane in solo flight across this continent and return. This was in 1928. She was the first woman to cross the Atlantic by air. This was in June, 1928. She established the first woman's altitude record and the first woman's maximum speed record.

Amelia Earhart Putnam now holds the woman's speed record over a 100-kilometer course, with and without a 500-kilogram load. She was the first woman to fly with an autogiro and the first to cross the continent and return with a plane equipped with an autogiro. She holds the autogiro altitude record of 18,415 feet.

Amelia Earhart Putnam has to her credit in excess of 1,500 solo hours. Her Atlantic nonstop solo flight of 2,065 miles gives her the woman's long-distance record. She is the only person who has ever crossed the Atlantic twice by airplane. She and Colonel Lindbergh are the only two who have crossed the Atlantic in solo flight.

Modest, retiring, resourceful, and courageous, she flew across the north Atlantic for fun and for the honor of her sex.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILLION-DOLLAR INCOMES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a clipping from the Oklahoma City newspaper. I am sure none of my colleagues would like to offer it, because it is in the nature of a criticism, but I think it ought to be inserted in the RECORD so that the opposite side may be properly presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

DOWN TO THE LAST MILLION

So when I saw the outbreak of red rash that followed Huey's proposal to limit incomes to a million bucks per year I said to myself: That's hooey. Think of limiting people—the best people—to a lousy million a year.

Dear reader, do you know what that means? Did you ever try to skimp along on a measly million dollars a year? Did you ever even sit down and try to figure out how far a million will go when stretched over 365 days?

Of course you haven't. You don't give a tinker's rap how the other half lives. But I'm not that kind of a brute. It ain't in me to see folks suffering. So I did figger it out, and here is the gruesome result:

BUDGET FOR FAMILY OF FOUR

Having income of not more than $1,000,000 per annum, consisting of father, mother, daughter, and doggy.

Traveling	41,000
Sundries, miscellaneous, and indispensables	64,000
Grand total	1,008,945

There, what did I tell you—every dollar of that million gone, eight thousand bucks in the hole, and no telling where the next meal's gonna come from.

So if you see that HUEY LONG, just tell him for me that if he thinks a family can get along on less than a million a year, that's all hooey. Besides, I know a thousand cotton pickers' families in his State that spent almost that much last year between them.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me preface my remarks on the pending amendment by saying that I have been and still am in full sympathy with those Senators who wanted to dispose of the pending bill as soon as possible. I believe that feeling is shared by every Member of the Senate. If the Senate had not already gone into the tariff field and adopted amendments providing for tariff rates on certain specific, selected products, I would not have offered this amendment. If the Senate had kept out of the tariff field and the amendment had then been offered, I would have voted against it. It seems to me unwise in this bill at this time to try to enter the domain of tariff legislation. But, Mr. President, the Senate has passed that line, and I see no reason why, inasmuch as four selected articles have been put into the bill and tariff rates provided for them, any Senator who has in mind any other item upon which he thinks a tariff should be levied is not entitled to the same honest and fair consideration as has been accorded to oil, lumber, copper, and coal. I have tried my best, Mr. President, to cooperate with those in charge of the bill, as I think all other Senators have, to bring about a fair and speedy termination of the action of the Senate upon the measure.

I am offering this amendment in the exact form in which the Senate agreed to it upon the tariff bill, and practically in the same form in which the Senate agreed to it when we considered the farmers' marketing act. So twice this amendment has been agreed to, both times by a substantial majority.

When I offered it on the tariff bill, I made one change in it to meet an objection which had been urged by President Hoover as it had been presented at that time. I did not believe the objection was valid; I did not believe it had any merit whatever; but, realizing that the President had a different view, and had so expressed himself publicly, I added a provision to the amendment to meet his objection.

Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to give the farmers of the United States the benefit of the protective tariff on agricultural commodities. It seems to me, therefore, since we have a protective tariff, and since it is conceded that the producers of the commodities which feed our Nation should be treated the same as the manufacturers and others who have the benefit of tariff duties, that, regardless of whether a Senator believes in a tariff or is opposed to a tariff, he ought to support this amendment. Indeed, it only gives to the farmer the benefit of one-half the tariff that is levied upon his products. It shows on its face that it is designed to give to the farmer one-half of the tariff rates under existing law. It is conceded that he now gets no benefit whatever in that direction.

The President of the United States in his campaign for election announced that one of the three major things he was going to do, if he became President, was to give the farmers the benefit of the tariff. The effort he has made in that direction is confined to the existing so-called farm marketing act. I am sorry to say that he is opposed to what is known as the debenture method of giving the farmer this benefit. Nevertheless, as I have said, the Senate has twice, after a full debate, by a substantial majority each time, passed this particular proposition.

Mr. President, I listened the other day with a great deal of interest to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who sits by my side. Incidentally, I sat by his side in the House of Representatives before we came to this body. I have enjoyed an intimate acquaintance with him during all my public service in Washington. I have for him the greatest of respect. I recognize his sterling honesty and his conscientiousness. When he made his speech here a few days ago in favor of a tariff on lumber he pictured a scene out in the lumber country of the State of Washington that must have been appealing to every person who could hear what he said. He pictured the suffering and the misery and the hardships of those who depend upon the lumber business for a living. He plead with his associates here for a tariff upon lumber—a tariff that in effect is an embargo.

I could take his speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read all that part of it in which he was describing the condition of the people of Washington, and it would apply 100 per cent to the farmers who live in the great Middle West and who produce the food that keeps this Nation alive. I could have applied it to the southern part of South Dakota and to a tier of counties in the northern part of Nebraska where drought and grasshoppers have brought affliction to all farmers. It would have applied also to every farmer in the great prairie part of our country—farmers dependent for their livelihood upon the tilling of the soil. They are all suffering in this great depression. They were suffering before the manufacturing East felt the misery that came when this depression finally engulfed the whole country.

We warned you then that agriculture was suffering. At first you laughed at us. You said there was no farmer question; but we told you then, we told you many times, that unless you gave relief to stricken agriculture, eventually that injury to the fundamental corner stone of our prosperity would bring down the entire temple in ruins upon our heads.

That time has come. Our prophecies have been proven by history to be true. Now we are taking one part of the country, as my good friend from Washington [Mr. JONES] so well described it, suffering in misery and suffering for the necessaries of life, and we propose, and have already gone that far, to relieve the sufferings of the people living in the lumber country by adding to the sufferings of those who till the soil in the great Middle West.

There is none of us who would not be glad to relieve human suffering wherever we find it; but, Mr. President, it seems to me it is a mistake to go into two sections of our country, both suffering, both having millions of people who are not able to support their families and their children and keep them from want, and say to one class of those suffering people, "We will relieve your burdens by adding to the sufferings and the hardships of those who are in just as bad condition as you are."

That is what the tariff on lumber means. That is what the tariff on coal means; and, Mr. President, I can not help but digress, perhaps, for just a moment to say that it seems to me we have gone tariff crazy. Wherever we find something wrong we are going to remedy it by a tariff; and we are going to put the resulting burdens upon those people who are already suffering, often in a greater degree than those for whose benefit the tariff is levied.

We ought to conclude from that, it seems to me, that no matter what we may think, no matter what we may want, this demonstrates that we can not get blood out of a turnip. This demonstrates that we can not relieve the sufferings of one section of our people by adding to the burdens of another portion. It demonstrates that if we want to produce revenue we must go to the sources where the revenue exists. No matter what our theories may be, no matter what we may think about justice or injustice or the cause of all this trouble or anything else, if we are going to raise revenue we shall have to raise it from the men who have the revenue.

That, it seems to me, is the reason why we have been mistaken in relieving the big incomes, the large inheritances, the people who have incomes and who inherit property away beyond the limits of the power of money to bring comfort or happiness. We are going to relieve them, and we are going to do it at the expense of the downtrodden and the overburdened who are already suffering under burdens which they can not bear.

It is not my intention to delay the Senate with a debate on this particular measure, because I think every Senator understands it. It was debated so fully and completely by the Senate in the last Congress that I would hardly feel warranted now in taking up any great amount of the time of the Senate in discussing it further. I believe that all people who have studied it agree with me that this method will bring relief to agriculture to the extent of one-half of the tariff levied upon the various items of agriculture. Its mode of operation is comparatively simple. It will not require a great amount of machinery. It undertakes in no way to transgress, I think, upon the constitutional rights of anybody or any set of men. It goes on the theory that we have adopted the protective-tariff policy in this country, and it undertakes to equalize the prosperity that protection brings among all the people of the country.

It is conceded now that the farmer in the field who produces for illustration, let us say, wheat, and has in the aggregate an overproduction of, let us say, 200,000,000 bushels in any given year, gets no actual good from the tariff. It is of no benefit to him, because, as every student of economy knows, the surplus above the possible consumption in our own country—the surplus that must be sold abroad in the world's market—fixes the price of the entire product. This amendment does what President Hoover said should be done, and what those who supported him echoed and reechoed over the country: "Prosperity will come, because Hoover will make the farmer equally prosperous with the manufacturer. He will give the producers of this country the benefit of the tariff."

Everybody knows that that has not yet been done. This amendment does not give the farmer the full benefit of the tariff, though it ought to, I think. The debenture ought to be for the full amount of the tariff; but those who are behind the debenture have taken only one-half of it and said, "We will be satisfied if you will give us the benefit of one-half of the tariff. While manufacturers and others in other fields get the benefit of all of it, give us one-half. We get no benefit now."

It is conceded, I think, that to the extent of one-half of the tariff this plan will work. It does not pay any of this money out of the Treasury of the United States from the general fund. It goes on the theory that we are all wedded, whether we like it or not, to the protective-tariff theory, and it puts the farmer in the same basket with the manufacturer and all others, so as to give the farmer an equality under the tariff.

Here is the tariff on manufactured goods and other goods, bringing in an immense amount of money; but the farmer, because he produces a surplus of food, is unable to get the benefit of the tariff on his products. He gets no benefit from it; and so we say, "Out of the revenue that comes from the tariff coming in to benefit those who do get the benefit of the tariff, we will pay to the producers who get no benefit one-half of the amount of tariff on their various items of production."

Mr. DILL and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, has the Senator computed, or had computed for him, the amount that the debenture will diminish the revenue that comes in from tariff rates?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have not. It will diminish it, of course.

Mr. DILL. Has the Senator any idea of the amount?

Mr. NORRIS. I should not want to make a guess with regard to it, but it will reduce the revenue to some extent.

Mr. DILL. Of course, the debenture must come out of that revenue.

Mr. NORRIS. It comes out of that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Are the rates that are proposed half of the tariff rates, as they were before?

Mr. NORRIS. Half; yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. The master of the Grange estimated about $100,000,000 before upon that proposition. Personally, I do not think that is enough. I think it will be more.

Mr. NORRIS. I should think myself that it would be greater than that.

I yield now to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I was about to ask the same question that the Senator from Washington asked; but I was wondering whether the Senator could not find out from the Treasury Department just how much the pending proposal would upset the Budget, and what effect it would have on the Government revenue?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the first place, I did not intend to offer this amendment until a day or so ago; and then it depended upon the action of the Senate on these other tariff items. Therefore, I had not taken up the matter with the department. In the next place, I will say to the Senator, that I should look with some suspicion upon any figures that came from the Treasury Department, if they gave them to us.

I would not have said that if I had not been asked the question, but I have seen so many figures from the Treasury Department which merely carried out their idea of what they wanted, which seemed to me to have been gerrymandered to meet those ideas, that I would not want to rest my case on figures coming from the Treasury Department.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator, in this connection, that last year we appropriated $500,000,000 for the Farm Board to help the farmers, and I think it can be safely said that half that amount was lost and very little benefit was received by the farmers. So that if it took $100,000,000 to carry out the pending amendment, it would be far less in the way of cost than the former plan, and we know this would do some good.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think on principle we should not consider that question, although, of course, the adoption of this plan would have an effect on the revenues. Here is the proposition as I see it. We have a protective tariff. The farmer has to bear his share of the burden, and he does not get his share of the benefit, which is what we want to give him through this amendment. If in giving him his share of the benefit we cut down the amount of money which comes in from tariff collections which would otherwise go into the Treasury, that would only go to equalize the benefit, under our theory. We have no right, it seems to me, to say, "We will not equalize the tariff for the farmer, because some of the money which it would take to equalize it would otherwise get into the Treasury. You would stop it on its way." If we want to be fair—and I think we do—we must admit to start with that all of our people are to be put on as nearly equal a basis as possible so far as tariff benefits are concerned.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would not the effect of the debenture simply be to allow the farmer to exchange in foreign markets his goods for foreign goods and to bring those goods in free of duty? That would be the effect of it, and to that extent, since he has to sell in a free market, it simply gives him the privilege of exchanging his goods in a free market and bringing back from foreign countries manufactured goods free of duty. It would take no money out of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. It would take no money directly out of the Treasury. It would stop money on its way to the Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY. It would simply stop money from going into the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. This is what the effect would be: When the farmer had produced a surplus, he would be given what is designated by the Farm Board as a debenture. For instance, as to wheat, for every bushel the farmer exported to foreign countries the board would give him a piece of paper called a debenture, which would show that he had exported so much wheat, and that debenture's value would be arrived at by multiplying the number of bushels of wheat he exported by one-half of the tariff on wheat. Then it is provided that the debenture will be received at 100 cents on the dollar in the payment of tariff duties on any imports coming into the United States.

When this plan was first proposed, that is as far as it went. President Hoover offered some objections to it, and his principal objection, as I have read the objections, was that the importers, who would have to buy these debentures, would organize and force down the value of the debentures. To my mind, the debentures would sell for a fraction of a cent under par, because they would be worth a hundred cents on the dollar to the importer in paying duties. It would be like the exporter having a $100 bill that was good only to the importer. If the importer could buy it for $99 or $99.50, he would make as clear profit the difference between what he paid and what it would be worth to him when he used it in paying export duties on foreign products.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. The President said the importers would form a combination and would not pay anywhere near par for the debentures. So in this amendment—and it was the same when I offered it to the tariff bill—I have provided that the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in his hands coming from import duties, should buy these debentures at 98 cents on the dollar. That would insure their always selling above that amount in the market.

Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL. If the Senator has stated it, I did not hear it, as we could not hear him very well on this side, but what is the estimated price level of wheat, for instance, carrying out the illustration the Senator submitted, in this country under the operation of the debenture plan compared with the price level of the wheat we export and sell abroad?

Mr. NORRIS. The price of wheat in the domestic market would immediately go above the price in the world market by one-half of the tariff on wheat.

Mr. HULL. That is the estimated increase?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. There can be no possible doubt about that. I do not think that is questioned even by the enemies of the plan. It would mean that the price of wheat here would go up to above the world price by the amount of the debenture named in the bill, which is one-half of the tariff.

Mr. HULL. So that by the expenditure of $100,000,000 in operating the debenture plan we would accomplish an increase of 21 cents a bushel on the entire 600,000,000 bushels of our domestic wheat production on the average?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. In regard to the matter just touched upon by the Senator from Tennessee, the Farm Board claims that its operations are at this time raising the price of wheat about 15 cents above the price in the world market; that is, after allowance for freight to the world market. So that this would add 21 cents and make the price that much above the world market price. It seems to me that at the present low prices of farm commodities half the tariff, and even all the tariff, would not be enough to protect the cost-of-production price.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that, and always have, that while we were clamoring about doing something for the farmer we were saying to those who were opposing our efforts, "We will accept just one-half of what we give to everybody else." That seems to me much more than fair; and I can not conceive, myself, why we should push the farmer out of the tariff picture. I can not understand why we should continue to compel the farmer to buy in a protected market and sell in a free-trade market; why we should compel him, as we do under our tariff laws, to buy on this side of the tariff wall and to sell his products on the other side of the tariff wall.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. When we raised the rates on farm products, of which we produce more than we consume, we did it on the theory that it would help the farmer; but the practical operation has been that it does not help the farmer at all. The only way in which he can be helped in the price of the product is through the plan the Senator proposes, and the only way in which he can be given equal treatment with the manufacturer, which was the intent in the adoption of the tariff rates, is through this plan.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator, and I thank him for his suggestion.

Mr. SMITH and Mr. THOMAS of Idaho addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment.

I have often said it before, and I do not want to become obnoxious by repeating it, but I do want to say once again that it is an impossibility for us to continue a permanent policy which will compel the men and women who toil and produce the food we eat and the clothes we wear to do their labor at less than cost. They are doing that now, and have been doing it for a long time. It will not work as a permanent policy. People with education, people who have tasted freedom, people who have the ability and the sense to see the difference between the way they are downtrodden and the way others are reeking in wealth, will not forever submit to a policy which permits that.

In common justice we owe it to the men and the women who do our work and produce our food to see that they should not become peasants or slaves, that they should be put upon a basis of equality with all of us, and if it does take some of the money that would otherwise get into the Treasury, the answer is, Mr. President, that we should levy a greater tribute upon those who have so much money that they do not know what to do with it, and can not possibly use it for enjoyment or any other profitable purpose.

I yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I just wanted to state that it is impossible for the farmers to organize and gather resources sufficient to enable them to charge enough to enable them to make a profit, taking into consideration the domestic consumption, the amount of the tariff, and the exportable balance, selling their products in competition with other articles. This plan would simply give the farmer at least a part of the wherewith to buy in the protective market, where, under the law, he is forced to buy.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Referring again to my friend the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who made an earnest plea and a perfectly honest plea for his people, I want to say again that, no matter what our beliefs may be or what our disagreements may be about economic policy, we must come back to the proposition that one can not pull himself over a fence by hauling on his bootstraps. We can not get money where there is no money. The Senator can not relieve his people who are in the lumber business by making it impossible for my people to buy their lumber. It does not make any difference what one's theory of government may be, there are farmers who are living now in houses dilapidated and falling down, farmers who have no decent houses in which to live, who have no barns in which to stable their stock, but who want to buy lumber. Lumber is one of the necessaries of the farmer's existence. He must buy it; and if the price of lumber is raised so high that he can not buy it the lumber business will be ruined, because lumber will be no good to those who own it unless they can sell it. They must have purchasers.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement on the debenture and I have been very friendly to it and have supported it. But a few days ago the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry accepted and authorized a report of the new farm bill which has been agreed upon by the farm organizations of the country. That bill provides that it shall be optional with the Farm Board to use either the equalization fee, the debenture, or the allotment plan. The bill has the support of all the farm organizations of the country, and I am very anxious that it shall be brought to a vote before this session ends. I am wondering why we could not consider that whole bill rather than the debenture which is now presented here. I am simply raising the question.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Idaho makes manifest an interest in the so-called McNary bill, which, for his information, I might advise him at this time was offered yesterday by me as an amendment to the pending tax bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Would there be any objection to offering it as a substitute for the pending amendment, because it would take care of the debenture, as well as the other features?

Mr. NYE. I see no reason why it should be offered at this time as a substitute before we have had a chance to debate the issue that is before the Senate at this time.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. The adoption of the debenture at this time would preclude any consideration of the general farm bill.

Mr. NYE. Not at all. It seems to me that the adoption of the debenture would pave the way for the offering of those features in the McNary bill which are not covered by the debenture.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say a word or two on that. I did not expect to discuss it, but I want to be practical, and I believe the Senate wants to be practical. I am in full sympathy with those who are behind the bill of which the Senator speaks, although I am not familiar with a good many of its details. I realize that it would probably be an impossibility to put upon the pending bill as an amendment the bill to which the Senator refers. I doubt very much if that would be possible.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I was asking for information, as I am anxious for action.

Mr. NORRIS. I meet the Senator in the same spirit in which he asks the question. I think this is a practical and comparatively simple method. It may not be the best method. Experience may show that we will want to discard it for one of the various other suggestions, but it has twice had the favorable consideration of the Senate. In its very terms it is the simplest method that has ever been proposed. It is not original with me. I do not claim to be the originator of the plan. I am claiming nothing for myself. I have had other plans which I have laid aside because of this.

Personally, I voted for all of the various remedies for farm relief, except the allotment plan, which has never yet been presented to the Senate. As to some of them I had some doubt. One of the doubts I had was the complex machinery usually required to put them into effect. But I was willing to submerge any technical objection I might have. I think we ought to be willing even to take a chance if necessary to save agriculture, to save the farmers of America from being slaves—in a more true sense, however, to save our country itself because our farmers never will be slaves. Do not forget that.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McGILL. I find in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska the following language:

(a) Whenever the board provided for in the agricultural marketing act approved June 15, 1929, finds it advisable, in order to carry out the policy declared in section 1 of said agricultural marketing act, with respect to any agricultural commodity, to issue export debentures with respect to such commodity, said board shall give notice of such finding to the Secretary of the Treasury.

I am wondering if the Senator from Nebraska means by that that the debenture plan is only to be effective upon action taken by the board mentioned in the agricultural marketing act.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I say that is true, and I say it with a great deal of reluctance. We have gone as far as we possibly could to meet those who have opposed farm relief. In this case we have gone so far as to put it in within the power of the President's board to say whether and under what conditions they will proceed to operate under the bill as to any given products.

Mr. McGILL. Does not the Senator feel that it would be better policy to make the plan effective regardless of the decision of the board?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I frankly say to the Senator it would be, but we have to depend for the enforcement of this law and the carrying out of its terms upon the executive functions of the executive department of the Government. I am assuming they would carry it out in good faith. We put this power with the board, which really puts it with the President. I am assuming that if this is the law they will act in good faith under it. I do not think we legislate with any other idea.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. Since the debenture plan was voted on before, when it was offered as an amendment to the tariff bill and on one other occasion, the situation has changed a great deal. Agricultural prices have gone down materially. One-half of the tariff as a debenture is not enough under present conditions. While it might help the farmers and will, of course, help them, it is not enough, and it is unfair to take only one-half of the tariff as a debenture as a means to help agriculture under present conditions.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is a great deal in what the Senator said. As I said, it does not go as far as I would like to see it go, but those of us who have been trying to get relief for the farmers of America have been in this plight ever since the war. We have met with all kinds of opposition. We have compromised on all sorts of occasions to get something. We have brought in bill after bill only to see them destroyed and defeated by the influence of the administration, both this administration and the one preceding it and the one preceding that.

I am not challenging or questioning the good faith of those who are opposed to this kind of legislation. In the beginning there was much opposition here and in the other body where the first McNary-Haugen bill was defeated after long debate. I can see the viewpoint of those who are opposing it. We were proposing to do something that had never been done before. It was something new. We were proposing to enter into legislative fields hitherto untried. We realized that. We realized that we were treading in new territory, and we met defeat after defeat, first because it was said we were entirely wrong, that we had an entirely erroneous idea as to the condition of agriculture. But as the years passed on the distress commenced to percolate through all lines of business activity, and we have now reached a condition where most honest people will admit that our country can not continue permanently in a prosperous condition if agriculture, the foundation of all prosperity, is languishing and those who are doing the work are not making a living out of it.

It seems to me that is a fundamental proposition. We have said time and again, "If what we propose will not work, then let some one else bring forward something." The various bills which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have brought in here were introduced after careful consideration. We have said, "This is something new. Some things about it are rather indefinite, as we know and admit. But it is the best we can do." We have labored conscientiously and earnestly for years and years, listening to the tales of woe and distress that would turn a heart of stone to pity, those tales coming from all over the great West and Northwest.

We felt that something must be done. We realized that other Senators had not had the opportunity we of the committee had in listening to the stories that were narrated to us. We realized that other Senators did not have the information possessed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry about the distress and discomfort. We said time and again, as one bill after another was presented, "If this does not suit, you do something, you formulate a bill, you bring it in." I have made that outcry many times to the President of the United States. "Bring in something yourself. Propose something yourself." Never once until the marketing bill was presented did anyone ever bring a bill that it was even claimed would meet the conditions which we found to exist. We know what happened under the operation of that bill. That was Hoover's answer to the pledge he made to the American people that if he was elected President he would put the farmer on an equality with the manufacturer. Every child knows that measure has failed.

A good many of us who studied the subject said, "Unless you take care of surplus production you can not get a remedy that will work." No one has been able to show any remedy that will be effective and bring relief to American agriculture unless we take into consideration some method by which we will take care of the surplus.

Mr. President, I would be delighted if this amendment would result in levying higher taxes upon wealth. If we adopt the amendment, it will be necessary to do something of that kind. It ought to be done. I would be glad if that would be the result, because we have been too lenient with those who have big incomes. We have been too lenient with those who insist on controlling hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, not only while they live, but after they are dead as well.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. While the Senator is discussing that point, it becomes very appropriate at this time to remind him of his suggestion on a previous occasion that according to the Treasury estimates—and I agree that they are not sacred by any means—about $100,000,000 to support the debenture will be taken out of the revenues to be produced under the terms of the bill. Are those the figures?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the figure given by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. I want to be fair with the Senator from Louisiana. In my judgment it will take more than that. It will depend upon which of the products are utilized by the board.

Mr. LONG. The position we are in is this. Suppose that under the debenture it is necessary to take such a sum as that. I favor the debenture in principle and would like to see it the law. An effort is to be made to take the tariff items out of the bill which we have put on the bill. Motions have been made to reconsider them.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator can not get anything of that kind from what I said. What I did say was that it might result in increasing the rates on wealth. I am only referring to income and inheritance taxes.

Mr. LONG. I agree with that, but what I am saying is this. At least our tariff items are going to bring some revenue.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; some of them will. I think the tariffs on coal and lumber will prove to be an embargo.

Mr. LONG. If we adopt the debenture plan, does not the Senator think then the position he has taken about taking the tariff items out of the bill ought not to be reconsidered; that those matters ought to become a closed chapter because he is going to take $100,000,000 out, and he will have to find some more money for that purpose to take the place of the tariff money? I think the Senator is right in stating that what we should do is to help the farmer and not be so liberal with the big incomes in the United States as we have been in the past, as shown by past votes.

The point I am making is this: Some of us here are trembling and shaking about this thing. My State has to have this oil tariff or we are not going to be able to continue to operate our schools. Our State treasury is empty. But if we vote this debenture, would the Senator feel then, inasmuch as he had taken out $100,000,000, that certainly we ought not to bother the tariff items and take the funds out there; or are we going to have a double-barreled shotgun, that Senators who want to take the tariff out will insist upon that plan on the one hand, while some others want to take the tariff issue entirely out of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. First let me say it seems to me if I occupied the position the Senator does, I would want a tariff on oil. The other items will provide some revenue—I do not believe there is any doubt about that—and so will the other products included with oil. It seems to me if we pass this bill and anybody makes an attack again on the oil tariff that has been put into it, the Senator would be in a better position to resist it if this amendment were added than if it were not added. The only thing we will be trying to do is to get more revenue to meet what this takes out, and the Senator could logically say, "If you take out this tariff on oil, you are going to have to hunt additional places to get revenue."

Mr. LONG. I would like to have that argument appeal to the Senator from Nebraska. If it does, I would feel a whole lot safer. I think it is a good argument, and I hope the Senator thinks so.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is a good argument. Personally I am opposed to the tariff on oil. I am opposed to the tariff on coal. I am opposed to the tariff on lumber. I would like to reduce the tariff on a lot of other things. I voted yesterday for every one of the amendments offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If other amendments are offered, I am going to vote on them in accordance with my own belief in the light I have as to whether there ought to be a tariff or not, and whether it ought to be increased or diminished.

Mr. LONG. I was hoping that the Senator would go a little farther, inasmuch as we have amended the bill, and it is going to bring some revenue. He and others have expressed their opposition to it as the result of those items being in the bill. Now, he comes along with an amendment which must take some revenue out of the Treasury. I was hoping the Senator might see fit to say if we put the debenture over, certainly we would not come back and begin to take some of this money out. I was hoping the Senator might say that.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not give the Senator any assurance. To begin with, I do not know whether or not any such attempt will be made. I have not the remotest idea. If there is any such thing thought of it has not been disclosed to me.

Now, Mr. President, I want to conclude——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a feature which the Senator has not discussed to which I desire to call his attention. The Senator appreciates that our foreign commerce has greatly diminished. Will not the debenture on agricultural products, at least, directly stimulate our foreign commerce and indirectly stimulate our international trade respecting industrial and manufactured products?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it will. It will do something more than that; it will make agriculture prosperous and when that shall be done, in my judgment, we shall have removed 90 per cent of the difficulties that confront the country because of the depression.

Mr. BLAINE. Just another question. If such stimulation shall bring about an increased international trade, by the very nature of things there will be increased revenue under the general tariff law?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator from Nebraska has stated that if we shall make agriculture prosperous it will have a good effect upon everything else in this country. I agree with him, and I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he thinks, in view of present prices, that giving half the tariff as a debenture will make agriculture prosperous in the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. It will not do what it ought to do; if the depression continues, it will not come anywhere near doing what it ought to do, but it will to a great extent revive struggling agriculture, though not as much as it ought to do. However, if we can get rid of the general depression, if we can bring about conditions under which prosperity can to a certain, even though a partial, extent pervade the country and include business operations of all kinds—and that will come to a great extent if agriculture shall be made prosperous—then the need even of this proposed legislation will not be so great as it now is, because, in addition to the farmer having to sell in a free-trade market and buy in a protected market, he is the victim, as is everybody else, of the general depression.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. An inquiry was made a few moments ago by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] respecting the Federal Farm Board and the authority lodged in it under the terms of the Senator's amendment, to determine when the provisions of the amendment shall be put into execution. In view of, shall I say, the fallibility of the Farm Board, the blunders—and I am using a very mild term—of which it is guilty, the inefficiency which has characterized its administration, I am unwilling to lodge with them this discretionary authority. I inquire if the Senator may not find some other organization or instrumentality that might initiate the movement that would put the provisions of the amendment into operation?

Mr. NORRIS. What other instrumentality of government would the Senator suggest?

Mr. KING. I am not as familiar with the terms of the Senator's amendment as he is. I was wondering under the original debenture plan what steps were provided for an initiation of the movement?

Mr. NORRIS. There was a board set up. We should have to have some instrumentality to perform the duty because there are some products, for instance, as to which there might not be a surplus production for 10 years. The amendment would not apply to any such products. Somebody must determine, somebody must have the power to say whether or not there is a surplus. The surplus to a great extent, of course, is an estimate, and somebody must initiate the plan.

When we previously agreed to this proposal we thought we would set up a board. If the amendment provided for any other board, how would they be appointed? We could not appoint them. If we provided that the President should appoint them they would not be any better than the board he has already appointed. So while we might disagree a good deal as to whether the Farm Board is the proper place to lodge the authority, I confess I do not know any better place to lodge it.

Mr. KING. If I might indulge in an observation that may be regarded as too suave, it seems to me we are between the devil and the deep sea as between the Farm Board and the Secretary of Agriculture, and as between those two, the devil and the deep sea, I think I should take the deep sea and confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to determine when the provisions for debentures should be issued.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Secretary of Agriculture is the deep sea, then God save me from the deep sea. I would not go there. But the Senator may be right; that may be the best place to swim.

Mr. President, referring again to the necessity of raising additional revenue and going to sources from which it can be had, I want to read an extract from an article written by one of the brightest newspapermen in Washington and printed in the Nation, of the issue of May 21, 1932. I will read just a portion of it, because the author, Mr. Paul Y. Anderson, is discussing the particular matter of levying taxes upon those who have the money. He says:

> To me, however, the most incredible and dismaying thing in the whole history of the revenue bill is the cumulative testimony given by the representatives of wealth.

Mr. Anderson has slept with this revenue bill from its beginning; he followed it from the very time the hearings began in the Ways and Means Committee, and his statements are always accurate. He says further:

> A communist wishing to demonstrate that the wealthy people of the United States are, as a class, mean, selfish, and unpatriotic to the verge of treason could make no better case than by quoting the words of their own spokesmen from the printed record of the hearings. Over and over the House and Senate committees were told flatly that big business and big finance did not intend to bear their proportionate share of increased taxes and would resolutely and successfully evade every attempt to compel them. The commonest argument of Secretary Mills and those sharing his viewpoint against higher taxes on wealth was that wealth would certainly dodge them. It was nearer to being a case of indecent exposure than anything staged by the Minsky brothers. Of course, I do not believe that the great majority of the rich are quite as black as their spokesmen painted them. Mr. Mills, for example, very often gave the impression of being intoxicated with the eloquence of his own miscalculations. Nevertheless, under such conditions as now prevail in this country and in the face of those which are likely to prevail soon, it was sheer madness for wealth to place on record such an appalling indictment of itself. There has been considerable ribaldry in public and private over HUEY LONG's proposal to limit net incomes to $1,000,000 a year and net inheritances to $5,000,000. But ask the taxi driver, the cigar clerk, the farm hand, or the unemployed mechanic what he thinks about it—and don't ever think he hasn't heard of it. Gentlemen who come to Washington these days to tell congressional committees they will precipitate further unemployment by withdrawing their money from industry unless allowed to keep more than 46 per cent of their incomes after the initial $1,000,000 a year are doing no less, in my judgment, than firing off Roman candles in a powder house.
> Huey is no Cicero, but he spoke a mouthful when he said:
> "I'm not trying to hurt the rich; I am trying to save them; because this country won't be safe for them much longer if something isn't done to redistribute its wealth."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I heard what the Senator said a few moments ago regarding the probable chance of the so-called farm organization bill as an amendment to the pending tax bill. I must confess an agreement with the Senator as to the probability of that chance; but, since it is so problematical, I wonder, in view of the fact that we are striving now to accomplish the fullest measure of help that can be afforded to agriculture, if the Senator would object to increasing the amount of the debenture which would be allowed from half of the tariff duty to the full amount of the tariff rate which prevails?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, again I think I should be moved by what I regard as a practical consideration. I very much doubt the wisdom of attempting it. What we are up against now—and we ought not to forget it—is that one of the great objections to this suggested amendment is that we are going to divert that much money on its way to the Treasury, so that it will never get to the Treasury; in other words, it is conceded it will take considerable money to finance this operation. I agree with the Senator's suggestion, but it is not what we ought to have but it is what we can get, and we know that right now, in view of the situation the country is in, whenever the effort is made to take a dollar out of circulation that would otherwise get into the Treasury we are in difficulty at once, and I confess I am afraid of it. It would be fair, but we shall not be able to get what is fair at this time, and if the amendment shall prevail it will be the first time the plan has ever been tried. Let us put it in operation, if we can, with the idea that if it works, as I believe it will, we may increase the debenture later on.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. SMITH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Since the Senator first offered this debenture provision, is it not true that the price of farm products has dropped more than the whole tariff rate?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. BROOKHART. And farm prices are so low now that the whole tariff rate would not nearly protect the cost-of-production level.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede that, under present conditions, the whole tariff, if the farmers could get the benefit of it, would not be sufficient; but, Mr. President, I hope Senators will not get the idea now that anybody is contending that this is going to be a complete remedy for the depression. We have got to take into consideration when we are asking legislation of Congress the viewpoint of others who do not agree with us, and we have got to admit that we are now confronted with an economic condition that is worse than any condition that ever confronted our country outside of a time of war, and we have got to be willing to give and take. I think we would make a mistake if we undertook to put the entire amount of the tariff in this bill at this time. My judgment is that we would get nothing, and I should like to get this and let it be tried out.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I promised to yield to the Senator from South Carolina. I should like to yield the floor if Senators will permit me to do so.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I just wanted to ask the Senator this question:

It has been intimated here that this amendment will possibly take $100,000,000 out of the Treasury. Does not the Senator think that if we are so anxious to balance the Budget and get revenue we could lower some of these tariffs that amount to an embargo, and by enticing or allowing some of the goods to come in that are now kept out we could, at least temporarily, relieve this situation?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so; not only temporarily but permanently. I agree to that; but again we are confronted with the fact that we can not do it, no matter if we do want to.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly; but why deny the farmers this relief because it might take something out of the Treasury, when millions are being kept out of the Treasury by the other process, by which the farmer suffers?

Mr. NORRIS. I agree to that; but again we are helpless. On yesterday we voted a tariff on aluminum, which now does not come into this country at all. It is a monopoly, and something that is in common use. The head of the great aluminum monopoly is Mr. Mellon and Mr. Mellon's family; and we did not come within gunshot of lowering that tariff to a point where it would have brought in some revenue.

Now we are confronted with a condition, and we ought to realize just what it is. I hate to see those with whom I have worked for years trying to get farm relief come along now, when there is a possibility—I do not know—that we can get this proposal adopted, so that the farmer can get a little, and complain that I do not try to get something that I think we all ought to know would be an impossibility.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes—or, if the Senator desires—I will yield the floor.

Mr. LONG. I just wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from South Carolina, who have engaged in this little colloquy, to the fact that if the Senator from South Carolina had his way, and the tariff on these various items were reduced in order to bring in all these goods, it would not do anything but put American producers and American workingmen out of work.

Mr. SMITH. Where are they now?

Mr. LONG. A good many of them are out of work now.

Mr. SMITH. And under your high protection.

Mr. LONG. No; under the concentration of wealth, Senator—not under high protection; under the fact that wealth in this country has been concentrated to a point where there is no purchasing power in the hands of the masses. It is not due to the fact that American products have been protected. I deny that. It is due to the fact that there is no purchasing power in the hands of the masses to purchase what is produced in this country.

If we throw down the tariff walls and allow Cuban sugar to be brought in here duty free, my people in Louisiana will not be able to raise a pound of sugar. If we lower the tariff wall of 7 cents a pound on long-staple cotton, they will be feeding you cotton from Turkey and from Egypt and from India and from Russia, because they are raising it there and raising as good cotton as anybody can raise. If we throw down these tariff walls, we will do to these people just what has been done to the oil fraternity in the State of Louisiana and in the State of California and in the State of Kansas. We will shut down the oil wells.

The remedy is not to throw down the protective-tariff walls and put the balance of the people of this country out of work. The fact that we have 8,000,000 people out of work is no reason why we should put 100,000,000 people out of work. The remedy is not to throw down these tariff walls and let the slave from Cuba send his sugar in here duty free, and let the slave from Chile send his copper in here duty free, and let the slave from Venezuela send his oil in here duty free. The remedy that the Senator from Nebraska pretty well touches upon is in putting a purchasing power in the hands of the masses by decentralizing the overgrown fortunes of this country, which have accumulated to a point where there is no money in the hands of the common people, but it is all in the hands of the people at the top and they have brought stagnation to their own enterprises.

If we should go out here to-morrow and write every tariff item out of this bill, we would not do anything but simply throw this country open in such a way that there would not be any reason for anybody to raise any cotton or any wheat or to produce a single manufactured article. Why some of our good Democratic friends can not see that we are not helping ourselves when we increase imports, if we are going to throw our own people out of work, is something that I can not understand. That is our trouble now.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, when Alexander Hamilton presented the first tariff bill to the Congress of the United States he pointed out the effect it would have upon agriculture quite as truly as it has occurred at the present time, and he said that agriculture would have to be protected by bounties.

The bounty, of course, is the debenture. There is a difference in name and a little difference in the way of applying it, but it all comes out of the United States Treasury. So the debenture or bounty was a part of the tariff system from the beginning, a part of the tariff theory from the beginning; but that theory has been neglected. We have used the bounty only on a very few occasions—once, I believe, on sugar, and maybe a few other times in the history of the country.

The exportable surplus of the United States before the depression was from $1,800,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 of agricultural products; that is, in the form in which they were exported. Some of that was processed and was of more value than when it left the farm. Probably as it left the farms it was about $1,200,000,000.

There is no doubt but that that surplus is fixing the price of agricultural products in the United States. Here is the tariff wall to protect agricultural products, but these products must be sold first in the domestic market. They flood the market by the amount of this $1,200,000,000, if that be what the farmers get, and that breaks down the tariff protection entirely; so the debenture seeks to even up that difference, and in this proposition it is for only half of the tariff.

I am fully in accord with the principle, and I am fully in accord with the idea that if we could get this debenture for half of the tariff I would be willing to take it; but I see no assurance that we will succeed in getting this debenture for half of the tariff. If we should put it on the bill, it seems to me the bill will be vetoed when it gets to the White House, and that we will still fail in our efforts to get the desired protection.

Under that condition, I think the wise thing for us who believe in agricultural relief is to figure out what would be adequate and businesslike relief, and would properly handle this matter and make a fight for that. Then we could go back to the country and show that our proposition would have been successful if it had been adopted.

I think if we put on a debenture now for only half of the tariff rates, it will add a little to agricultural prices, but will still leave them away down deep in depression. So I think the farm organizations have adopted the sound basis for the relief that Congress should vote at this session.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. HULL. Will the Senator state, if he has it in mind, the total amount that would accrue to agriculture in the way of increased prices under the operation of this plan at one-half of the tariff?

Mr. BROOKHART. About one-tenth is exported. If $100,000,000 is the amount necessary to cover that, it would be about a billion-dollar increase in prices; but the farmers need about four or five billion dollars to get a cost-of-production price.

Assuming that one-tenth of the agricultural production is exported, and that that will require the $100,000,000, which the Grange has estimated—I think it is a little more than that—if we multiply that by 10, of course, it would increase the other nine-tenths at home as much as it does the one-tenth that goes abroad. That is a considerable sum by which to increase farm products, but it still leaves them far below the cost-of-production level.

I was about to say when interrupted that the three great national farm organizations—the union, the grange, and the bureau—have agreed that any system of farm relief must be based upon the average cost of production of these farm products. That is the basis of the success of every producing business in the country. Unless a business can get its cost of production and also some margin of profit it fails.

What is this cost of production? The present prices are not half the cost of production, and the tariff rates do not anywhere near level up to the cost of production. As the Agricultural Department figured the cost of production heretofore, they made no adequate allowance for the compensation of the farmers for their labor and they made no adequate allowance for depreciation. Were those two items properly increased, their method of figuring cost of production is all right, and then I think the debenture should be based upon that proposition.

Of course, I shall vote for a debenture that will give us $1,000,000,000 of increase. I should be glad to see that, rather than nothing; but since it would still fall so far short of prosperity I think we ought to consider the whole matter in a more businesslike way and decide what would be a proper use of the debenture, and I think there is another method of using it that is better than this amendment.

This amendment pays the debenture to the exporter. As he exports a farm product, he will get a debenture certificate equal to half the tariff rate on such a product if imported. Then he could draw that from the Treasury at the rate of 98 cents on the dollar if it is not redeemed by other parties at par. In that way the debenture is paid to the exporter. Some make the claim, and I have listened to the argument many times, that the farmer would get no benefit from that; that the exporter would not pass the benefit on down to the farmer. I am anxious to avoid that; so I have figured that we could increase the revolving fund of the Farm Board and give them a policy which would compel them to raise the price level to the cost of production and then use the debenture to pay the losses in case any losses occur in the final disposition of that surplus in the world market.

The Farm Board claims, under its present operations on wheat—I stated that a while ago—that it has increased the price at this time, or at the time Mr. Stone testified, about 15 cents a bushel above the world market, through its stabilizing or buying up of a part of the surplus. Assuming that that is true, there is another policy of the Farm Board that has probably done quite as much damage as that did good. That was the policy of holding this surplus as a constant menace over the world market. Any bidder in the world market points his finger right at this American surplus, and then bids the price down because of the threat that that surplus may come into the world market at any moment.

While nobody can tell exactly, I feel that this policy perhaps lowered the world market about as much as it increased the domestic market over the world market, perhaps more, even. If that be true, then the Farm Board operations in stabilization have done no good to the farmer, and we certainly have reached the lowest price level we have ever had in the recent history of agriculture.

Mr. President, I think the revolving fund of the Farm Board should be increased, but not for carrying out the policy it has been following. If the board is to continue that policy, I would take away what they already have; I would abolish the board. It will have to have a new policy, and that policy should be, first, to ascertain the cost-of-production prices of farm products for the five preceding years, we will say, and I would include in that the elements I have suggested. Then the Farm Board should bid those prices for all of the farm products that are offered, and that would at once raise the price level to the amounts bid.

The chairman of the Farm Board before the committee estimated that a billion dollars additional would enable them to do that. He said that half a billion would take care of cotton and wheat, and that those crops made up about half of the whole amount of farm products.

Then they should have a policy with reference to holding the surplus. It should not be held as a menace over the world market, but for a world demand, and in any period of six to seven years in the world's history there has been such demand. There never has been a period when there did not exist a demand that used up all of the agricultural production of the world, even including cotton, which is the biggest and hardest item of surplus to handle.

If such a policy were followed, the surplus might finally be disposed of on the world market with little loss, and the chairman of the Farm Board seems to think it might be disposed of sometimes with profit. This would require a minimum of debenture from the United States Treasury to cover the losses.

Has this plan ever been tried? Do we know anything about it? Yes; it has been absolutely demonstrated. It was the plan of the Wheat Corporation under the Food Administration during the war and after the war. We know exactly the machinery that was set up and we know exactly how it worked.

I have told this story many times, but I am going to tell it once more now. On the 10th of July, 1917, Mr. Hoover wrote a letter to President Wilson, and in that letter he said that England and France and Italy had combined together and appointed one buyer for all their wheat, and that they had decided to bid $1.50 a bushel for No. 1 northern, Chicago. He said, "The farmers can not afford to raise wheat under these war conditions at that price. So we will have to have a Government set-up, with money enough and authority enough to buy the wheat, until purchasers will pay a reasonable cost-of-production price to the farmers of the United States." He said, "Last year the farmers got $1.51, on an average, for their wheat, but the speculator sold it for as high as $3.25, and the price of flour was fixed on the basis of $3.25. We must stop that speculation."

No better outline of the farm problem was ever written. President Wilson immediately presented that question to the Congress, and got the law passed on the 10th of August, 1917, one month later. Four days later he appointed his Farm Board, and 16 days later, on the 30th of August, the Farm Board completed its deliberations and fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel, raising the foreign bid by 70 cents a bushel. There was no quibbling around about price fixing. The price was fixed just the same as any manufacturer fixes the price of his product at his factory. They determined that price by figuring out the average cost of production, and a reasonable profit on the capital investment, on top of that production cost.

As soon as that price was fixed, the same day, Mr. Hoover bid that price for all the wheat that was offered; not for any little bite in it, as the Farm Board had been doing, not for any part of the surplus, but he said, "Bring on your wheat, and here is your money." Of course the price went to that level on that bid that same day.

The price of the agricultural products should be fixed the same way now. If there were on the statute books at the present time a law applying to the various agricultural surpluses, in one day the price level could be restored, exactly as it was restored on wheat in 1917.

Congress had given the Wheat Corporation $150,000,000 to buy the surplus wheat, but they authorized them to borrow more if they needed it, and they needed $385,000,000 more. With the $150,000,000 and the additional amount, they bought and held $535,000,000 worth of wheat, and that is three times and more the operations of the present Farm Board, which have been criticized for dipping too deeply into the surplus. But they bought the entire surplus. They bought more than the surplus. Much of it was sold back in the domestic market. But there need be no loss in the domestic market, because that is absolutely under our control, by means of embargo tariffs or embargo provisions of the law. No losses occurred on anything that was sold back to meet the domestic demand. In fact, a profit was taken, and no losses occurred in the final disposition of any of it.

When 1918 came along, the fall of the year, the time for the sowing of the winter wheat, the President said, "Bread will win the war. Sow more wheat." Farmers heeded that cry, and they sowed about 18,000,000 acres more of wheat in the fall of 1918, and the armistice was signed on the 11th of November. Then it appeared that we might not need all that surplus wheat, the war being over, so we went into the winter months, and by the 1st of February the prediction was that there would be 1,200,000,000 bushels. Eight hundred million is the ordinary crop. Then Mr. Hoover and Mr. Julius H. Barnes, who was assisting him and who is now chairman of the executive committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce and prosperity adviser of the President of the United States, became frightened about their ability to finance that big prospective surplus. They feared that, with only $150,000,000, if the banks were not liberal in lending to them, they might not be able to handle it. So they came to Congress and said, "We need a thousand million dollars so as to be sure that the Government can carry out this operation in reference to this big surplus." Congress voted them every dollar of it on the 1st of March, 1919, after the war was over. That was a peace-time measure, so far as that is concerned.

They said, "We want authority to borrow more if that should not be enough," and Congress gave them that authority. So they had a billion dollars for wheat alone, and authority to borrow more if they should need it. They asked authority to buy and sell foodstuffs anywhere in the world, and to go into business anywhere. They put the Government clear into business clear through the year.

They asked authority to condemn the big terminal elevators, so that they could have storage facilities where they could hold the wheat as long as they chose to hold it. They got that authority. They asked authority to license the sellers and the dealers and the elevators, and control the business clear through; and they got that authority. They asked for authority to control the exchanges, and they put the exchanges out of business when they made the first bid in 1917. The board of trade never sold another bushel of wheat on futures while the Wheat Corporation lasted.

After getting this law passed on the 1st of March the yield of wheat was not good for 1919; there were only 968,000,000 bushels, when they were expecting 1,200,000,000 bushels. That was more than the average crop of 800,000,000. So Mr. Barnes had to buy 138,000,000 bushels in order to maintain the price of $2.26. It had gone up 6 cents, because railroad rates went up, and they put that onto the railroads. But he did maintain the price, and the price went even higher. Then they finally sold the wheat at a profit of $59,000,000, which amount was turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, that illustrates an operation, a successful and profitable operation, in handling the wheat surplus, and giving the farmers a cost-of-production price for their product. We would not always succeed in that way. Sometimes there would be a loss, and I would like to see the debenture used to pay any such loss. I think it should be the full amount of the tariff. Sometimes half of the tariff would pay the loss, sometimes less, and sometimes there would be a profit. The chairman of the Farm Board said there would be a profit on some of these operations. But the rate of the debenture should be enough so that there could be no question about the ability of the Farm Board to handle this proposition under this policy.

If that were done, I think we could improve the world market. I do not think the Farm Board's present operations have done so. They have broken down the world market, because their policy has been to hold the surplus as a constant menace to the world market. The surplus should be withdrawn from the world market and held distinctly for a world demand, which is altogether a different policy.

In view of the present tariff policy, I think the world will not buy anything from us it does not have to buy. It is going to shun us, is going to put up retaliatory tariffs against us; has indeed already done that all along the line. An agricultural surplus has a better chance than any other kind of a surplus in the world market because it is more of a necessity. Many countries can not produce their own food, or their own cotton, for that matter. They will have to buy those things from us.

The surplus of cotton, being over 50 per cent, is the biggest problem in this exportable-surplus matter. But that 50 per cent of cotton is about 65 per cent of the world's demand. So it can readily be seen that if we had that 50 per cent of cotton financed and held back under one agency for a world demand, we would have something to say about the world price.

We have nothing to say now about the world price, because there are about 46 exporting agencies, according to the last check I made, all competing with each other in selling cotton to the world. Every bidder in the world market can go to any one of those 46 and bid, and if the price is too high, go to another and tell him it is too high, and that permits the bidder to fix the price all the time. The world market price of cotton is therefore not affected by the fact that we control 65 per cent of the supply, because our surplus is not financed and held back in the way I have suggested.

I have a report as to the consumption of cotton last year in factories in Russia, and it shows that they operated at only 60 per cent of their capacity because they could not get the cotton. If Russia had been recognized by the United States, and we had had trade relations with them, they could have used probably one to two million bales of American cotton, and that would have improved the condition a great deal.

At any rate, one great agency, properly financed, adequately financed, can learn conditions all over the world and can market surplus products better than the agencies which are now competing with each other in trying to sell these various products.

Mr. President, if you and I owned this big American farm, if it were our farm, we would agree this afternoon on the policy I have been urging. There would be no question about it whatever. It is the policy pursued by every industry that has an exportable surplus. Every one of them is separating and segregating that surplus from the domestic market. It is not flooding the domestic market by offering it for sale to the home people, but it sells that surplus for the best price it can get in the world market, and usually at a lower price than is charged the people in the home protected market. So agriculture, in order to get equality, must be brought to that level, which can be done by an adequate debenture to pay the losses on the surplus.

Does the Treasury owe it to the farmers to pay these losses? Is that an obligation the Treasury should assume? The Treasury has assumed that obligation for almost every other line of business. It has paid subsidies in every direction. It paid subsidies to the shipping interests. It paid subsidies to the railroads. It paid them $529,000,000 to guarantee their war-time profits for six months after they were turned back into private ownership in 1920. Right now it is proposed by a House committee that another subsidy be paid out of the Treasury to the railroads through the repeal of the recapture clause of the transportation act. Under that clause there is an accumulation of $361,000,000 that belongs in the Treasury of the United States as the Government's half of the profits over and above 6 per cent as provided in the law. But the railroads have not paid it into the Treasury. Upon one excuse and another they have held it back, and now they come in and ask a repeal of the recapture clause, and eventually obtained a favorable report from a House committee at this time. That means another subsidy of $361,000,000 out of the United States Treasury for transportation.

Again I want to call attention to the condition of the railroads last year. I read into the RECORD the other day how a confidential agency, reporting on the dividends of the railroads last year, has had something to say. This was not published in the newspapers. They do not give out this kind of information for the public to read, but confidential economic letters are written to the railroad managers and to the big newspapers. Here is what was said about last year in one of these letters:

> The most challenging economic statistics of the depression are that, in spite of the fact that production volume and wage payments have gone down together to barely more than half of predepression volume, the grand total of interest and dividend payments has been maintained higher than for any year prior to 1929. Even the dividend payments of railroads this year have exceeded those for 1928 and for any previous year in railroad history.

This letter is dated the 25th of January, 1932, and is a review of 1931 conditions. Then they said:

> Even the dividend payments of railroads this year have exceeded those for 1928 and for any previous year in railroad history.

Who ever thought that was the condition after all the publicity about the bankrupt conditions of the railroads of the United States? Yet I have no doubt that this economist, writing this confidential letter, is giving them as nearly a true estimate of the condition as it is possible to give.

So, Mr. President, we drew from the Treasury this subsidy of $529,000,000 in actual cash in 1920, and that is the same six months' period in which the Federal Reserve Board planned the deflation in agriculture. We are now proposing to give them $361,000,000 more by repeal of the recapture clause. I would say that agriculture is quite as important and the Treasury owes it quite as much as it owes transportation. It is said that we took over the railroads during the war and we did not take over the farms. But we did take over the fixing of farm prices, which is the same as taking over the farms. We did control them quite as effectually as we did the railroad earnings during and after the war.

Then we come along as soon as this session opens, and bill No. 1 offered in the Senate, I think, was the Budget balancing bill of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], because it appropriated $500,000,000 right away out of the United States Treasury to make loans to the railroads that had more dividends in 1931 than any previous year except 1929, to make loans to the banks and other business which collected bigger dividends on their bonds and stocks than in any period in their history except 1929.

So we do not hesitate to go into the Treasury for other things in the United States. In that situation I say the Treasury owes it to agriculture to give it this cost-of-production price. I think $1,000,000,000 will do it, as the chairman of the Farm Board said. With that additional sum I think we could, as Mr. Hoover and Mr. Barnes did for cotton, wheat, corn, oats, and livestock products, those staple products, handle the surplus of all of those at cost-of-production price and raise the domestic market up to the same price level. If that were done that would restore the buying power of agriculture and that would increase the prices to the extent of $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000 instead of merely $1,000,000,000.

With an increase like that agricultural prosperity would be at hand and the orders to other business growing out of that agricultural prosperity would start many of the wheels of industry in the United States. That would start us on a sound course toward a general prosperity in the country. I think there is no doubt, and I agree fully with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that the agricultural depression so long continued is perhaps 90 per cent of the cause of the general depression in our country. I think the other 10 per cent is due to the foreign loans we made which I described on last Saturday in my discussion.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for this amendment. I would prefer to take the bill which has been offered by the farmers. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry if that bill has been reported?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, almost unanimously the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry voted to report the bill favorably. The construction of the report was left to the chairman of the committee, who will probably report on it either to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that bill should provide a larger revolving fund. I think it should be amended to provide plenty of funds so there can be no question about the financial ability of the board to handle the matters placed under it. There are some other amendments which I suggested the other day. Then I think that the Congress should remain in session until that bill is enacted into law. The farmers of the country should see to it that we do remain in session until that time. There is little understanding of the distress involved in the depression. I think 20 per cent of the lands in the State of Iowa were in default in their interest payments on the 1st of March. I was informed recently that there were 500 mortgage foreclosures per week in the State of Iowa being started at the present time. I was also informed that the farmers are stopping these foreclosure sales by mob violence. I think they are justified in doing it under existing conditions.

Mr. President, it is certain that unless the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will say he is willing to give us this little measure of relief which the amendment proposes, we should formulate a real fight for a real farm bill that will give real relief and then, if it is defeated, put the responsibility where it belongs, in the other House or in the White House itself.

INVESTIGATION BY TARIFF COMMISSION—CRAB MEAT

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table and have immediately considered Senate Resolution 122. It is a resolution simply directing the Tariff Commission to investigate the difference in cost of production of crab meat and other kindred products here and abroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland, in view of the vote yesterday in which we repudiated the Tariff Commission and treated with more or less contempt any findings that they make, what is the good of wasting any more money in having the Tariff Commission make an investigation?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am very sorry to differ with the Senator. I think the investigations of the Tariff Commission accomplish a great deal of good.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall object if it leads to any debate whatever.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am quite certain the resolution will not lead to debate. It simply asks for certain information.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to have that understood.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let the resolution be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 122) submitted by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH on December 22, 1931, was read as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is hereby directed to investigate, for the purposes of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930, the differences in the cost of production between the domestic article and the foreign article, and to report at the earliest date practicable, upon crab meat, fresh or frozen (whether or not packed in ice), or prepared or preserved in any manner, including crab paste and crab sauce.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution, but I do want to make this observation. This is one of the poorest times in the world, if I may use that terminology, to introduce a comparison between domestic and foreign costs or to make an investigation with respect to any imported article. The unfortunate condition, the deplorable condition throughout the world, the fluctuation in prices from day to day, the depreciated currency, the fluctuation of the currency, make any finding that may be made to-day absolutely valueless in a week or month or year from now. It seems to me that any value which might be derived from this investigation would be merely speculative. It can not be the basis upon which to rely for any judgment or for any industrial activity.

Moreover, Mr. President, yesterday we flouted the findings of the Tariff Commission. The Tariff Commission found that there was no justification for an increase in the tariff on lumber, but in the face of this supposed scientific investigation, in the face of an investigation and report by a commission which our Republican friends would have us accept as sacrosanct, and which was to relieve us from the difficulties of tariff legislation and put our tariff laws upon a sound basis, we ignored their recommendation and put a very heavy tax upon lumber, which will be burdensome upon the farmers and upon the home builders and upon the American people generally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. In the first place it will give the farmer equal treatment under the tariff laws of the country. We have been attempting to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff for a number of years. The last tariff act contains rates that are absolutely valueless to the farmer, and yet Senators have continually justified their votes for other tariff rates upon the fact that they voted in the interest of the farmer. The best method whereby the farmer can get the benefit of the tariffs on the products of which the country produces more than it consumes is by the debenture plan.

I think, too, that the equal treatment of the farmer will bring a clearer realization to the American people of the futility and the foolishness of a policy that attempts to build tariff walls around the different countries of the world and thereby cause each nation to shut out more and more foreign trade and depend upon domestic trade among the people themselves,

I am not going to rehash the tariff fight of yesterday, as my friend from Utah [Mr. KING] started to do a moment ago, other than to say that the depreciated currencies of Canada have entirely changed the situation in the last few months. The arguments that have been made here about depreciated currency increasing prices in countries where it is used do not apply in Canada. In the first place, their money is used at par for the payment of their coastwise shipping of lumber around to the Atlantic coast. They have $1 advantage per thousand feet at all times, and above that they have the great advantage of the markets of the British Empire through their preferential tariff system.

I believe the tariffs adopted in the pending bill were necessary to complete the protective policy to the industries of the country and that as a matter of equal treatment we were jusified—in fact, we could not defend ourselves if we failed to take such action.

The second reason why I am for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is that this is the only chance that Congress will have to enact legislation that will be really helpful to the farmer. We are not going to pass this bill in any other way. If we pass the debenture plan separate and apart from the tax bill, the President will veto it. If we put it in the tax bill, the President will then be confronted with the problem of signing a bill that will balance the Budget of the United States and give the farmer a little better chance to balance his budget, or vetoing a bill that would bring money into the Treasury to balance the Budget simply because he refuses to give the farmer equal treatment under the tariff law. So I say I am in favor of it because it is the only method whereby we can secure legislation that will really help the farmer.

In the third place, I am for it because it will raise the prices of farm products; and, when all is said and done as to theories and plans to restore prosperity, the only way in which we are really going to restore prosperity is to start the sources of prosperity. The source of prosperity is the new wealth that comes out of the ground each year, the farm products, the minerals, the lumber, the fish out of the sea—these constitute the new wealth nature produces each year. Until those who produce this new wealth each year secure a profit upon that production we can not have prosperity restored.

I recognize that the debenture is not a sound policy, as such; it is but a part of a false system of tariffs; but since the system is in existence, the farmer should be included in its operation. The debenture in any case should not be operative over a long period of time, but if by the use of the debenture we can raise the price of wheat, the price of corn, the price of cotton, the price of the basic necessities that come from the farms of this country, we shall place in the hands of the producers of these products sufficient money to enable them to go to the stores and buy new goods. When they buy new goods the storekeepers will order new goods from the factories; when the factories have orders they will put their men to work; when men go to work there will be more money with which to buy more goods; and then will confidence come back, and not until then.

The proposals that we hear so much about of the extension of credit to bring prosperity, after all, will not do very much permanent good. They are proposals to loan more money to somebody. The people who now owe borrowed money can not pay their debts, and the farmer, least of all, does not need any more opportunity to borrow money. What he needs is an income from what he produces so that he may pay the debt which he has already incurred.

I think, however, that much might be done to start prosperity again by a proper handling of the silver question and by the adoption of policies which will increase the price of silver. The history of the world shows that whenever the price of silver goes up the prices of other basic products go up. The only time when the products of the country have really increased in price since this crash came in 1929 was last fall. At that time the price of silver went up 13 cents an ounce. The price of wheat, the price of corn, the price of cotton followed it, and there was real hope in the agricultural population of America that we had reached the bottom of the depression; but silver immediately dropped, and farm prices also dropped. The trouble with——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I will yield in just a moment, if the Senator please.

The trouble with our attempts to do something to raise the price of silver is that we can get no cooperation from the White House. Now, I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I say to the able Senator from the State of Washington that when I represented his great State as a Representative at large I had as a colleague, who was the predecessor of the eminent Senator, who himself was latterly a Member of the House, a gentleman of the name of W. C. Jones, of distiguished ability. He presented before the House of Representatives in a discussion of silver, together with maps, reports, and records, the theory that as the price of silver rose the price of wheat rose, that as the price of silver fell the price of grain fell; and he sought to establish that conclusion by records which he said justified it. May I ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], who was the successor in the House of Representatives from the same district as the gentleman to whom I have referred, does he confirm that theory and advocate it in the observations he is now making?

Mr. DILL. I do absolutely. The history of the world shows that for centuries the price of silver has been the barometer of the prices of the products of the earth. More than a billion people of the world to-day use silver as their money. I do not argue for a pegging of the price of silver in an unnatural way; I do not contend that we should take money out of the Treasury in order to lift the price of silver for the owners of the silver mines of America and of the world; but I do argue for a recognition of the fact that silver is the basic money of more than half the population of the earth, and that the moment the price of silver rises the purchasing power of a billion people, particularly in the Orient, rises with it.

When, however, we have attempted to secure the approval of the President of the United States of legislation that would bring about a real conference looking to the use of silver for monetary purposes—not with a view of abandoning the gold standard but using silver as a money along with gold—we have met with only rebuffs from the White House. Any proposals that have been made here whereby the price of silver might be raised in a normal manner have never found support; and in a Congress so closely divided as is this Congress, in both the House and the Senate, it is indeed a waste of time and energy for those of us who believe in this method of restoring prosperity to spend our time in passing legislation only to be vetoed when it goes to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

The most sensible, the most practical suggestion that has been made for increasing the price of silver is the proposal that the Treasury of the United States should be authorized to buy silver in the markets at its market price; that we should then coin that silver into dollars, store them in the Treasury, issue silver certificates, and make them a part of our currency, backed not only by the silver which we have placed in the Treasury but backed also by the 40 per cent gold reserve.

We have been using silver certificates in this country for a long time; they are as sound money as any kind of money we have ever had; and the proposal of buying silver in the markets of the world, coining it into money, where it would not be placed back in the market, thus removing a surplus, will automatically lift the price of silver and at the same time will involve no risk of the loss of money by the Government, so far as that is concerned, because the only loss will be the expense of coining the new money in the form of silver dollars and silver certificates. It would not be a fiat currency; it would not be an inflation; but it would be a sound and reasonable and practicable procedure whereby we would remove from the markets of the world the surplus silver that has been thrown there by the actions of England in India and by the French in Indo-China.

I am told by those who have such statistics collected that there is a surplus of something like 250,000,000 or 300,000,000 ounces of silver in the markets of the world. The present price of silver is less than 30 cents an ounce. I believe it is a safe assertion to make that for $100,000,000 we could take the surplus silver of the world off the market, coin it into dollars, issue silver certificates that would be legitimate, sound money for the use of our people, and thus raise the price of silver to a point where the purchasing power of a billion people on the earth would come into play, and prosperity would naturally follow, because everybody knows that hundreds of millions of people to-day would buy our products if their money was worth anything in this country; but the depreciation of silver has made it impossible for them to buy in any quantity whatsoever.

Mr. President, this question will not down. It is a question that hangs over us at all times. It needs the attention of legislators who will think in sound terms, and who are willing to try a policy that has no element of danger whatsoever in it from the viewpoint of those who are afraid of inflation or those who are afraid of fiat money.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say a word?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Much of our present trouble comes not only from the demonetization of silver, destroying by law the purchasing power of silver as money and therefore taking away from it the privilege under the law that gold has; but, in addition, we are suffering from the appreciation of the value of gold because of the great amount of debts that have been created all over the world during the last 15 years payable in gold, therefore causing the law of supply and demand to operate more intensely on gold and making it increase greatly in value because of increased demand occasioned by greatly increased indebtedness.

Last week Professor Cassel, in addressing Oxford University, called attention to the fact that gold had by law been made the basis of contracts which fixed it as the standard in the payment of debts and that these vast debts had been created without the creation of a corresponding means for the payment of those debts. He called the attention of the British people—and I think people all over the world should study what he said upon that occasion—that the creation or manufacture of a means of payment had not kept pace with the creation of debts payable in a certain coin, and therefore the law of supply and demand operating upon the scarcity of the means of payment had driven the cost of gold in terms of the price of commodities gradually higher and higher; that as the cost of gold had increased the cost of commodities had decreased, and that that phase of the descending price level has not been measured and understood in the light of the value or in the price of gold.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am not arguing for the remonetization of silver. I do not desire to propose the doctrine that has caused so much conflict in a political way in America. I believe that it is too big a proposition to undertake to overcome the prejudice against it at this time as a method of solving the problems which confront us. I have suggested, however, what, to me, is the most practical proposal which has been made, namely, the purchase by the Government of the surplus silver on the markets of the world to-day, using it for money in the form of certificates, backed by the silver dollars that are to be coined and by the gold reserve. This would constitute a form of money that we have found to be absolutely sound. The purchase of this comparatively small amount of silver would have practically no effect upon our currency system; and it is a proposal that is worth trying. It can not hurt anything. I believe it would start the world in the direction of trading, and, then, if we would adopt the policy of tearing down the tariff walls that every nation has erected to shut out the trade of other countries by reciprocity agreements, I believe the world would again turn itself to international trade; that confidence would come again; and we then could work out some system of putting a stop to the provision in documents evidencing indebtedness that the debts shall always be paid in gold.

If, however, we attempt to remonetize silver, if we attempt to bring that controversy into the situation to-day, the people will lose sight of the greatest need of the hour, which is the increase in the price of the products of the earth which the people must have if they are to be able to buy the new goods of commerce and bring a restoration of prosperity.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator what amount of certificates he would issue against the silver which would be purchased according to the purchase price?

Mr. DILL. Dollar for dollar, and I would back them not only by the silver in the Treasury but by the 40 per cent gold reserve, just as the silver certificates which now circulate and have circulated in this country for generations have been backed. There is no sounder money in the country than those silver certificates.

Mr. BROOKHART. As the price of silver increased by its purchase there would be a less amount of certificates issued on the basis of the price of silver. Is not that so?

Mr. DILL. That is true; we would pay a larger amount of money, but we would still be removing the silver from the markets of the world.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator would leave it all redeemable by the gold standard?

Mr. DILL. Absolutely. I propose that because any other proposition is immediately called inflation; any other proposition is immediately called fiat and cheap money; and I would earmark the gold to 40 per cent of the amount of this silver.

Mr. BROOKHART. Have we not been off the gold standard ever since the Federal reserve system was inaugurated, anyway?

Mr. DILL. I do not want to go into a discussion of that technical matter. I am not so much concerned about the technical side of whether we are on the gold standard or whether we are not. I am concerned about a policy that will restore the purchasing power of the billion people of this earth, who, from the beginning of the history of money, have used silver as their currency.

I listened, as some of you may have listened some days ago, to a radio address by Winston Churchill, the great Conservative of England, in which he pleaded for the cooperation of England and America to make silver take its place as a money to be used throughout the world. He said that these two nations, and only these two nations, could do this. Yet, sir, in these days of depression, in these days when millions of men are out of work, in these days when millions of farmers can not pay their taxes, in these days when business grows worse, the President does nothing in this connection. We are met continually with proposals of more credit, more loans to somebody, more appropriations to some Government agency to sell somebody some bonds, when by the operation of natural law throughout the world there is an opportunity at least to test the theory that has never failed in the history of mankind since governments have existed as we know them to bring the price of products upward.

Why do we not try something? Why are we to be bound forever to the dead body of precedents of the past? Why can we not experiment a little bit, especially when that experiment will not endanger our money system, when it will not take any new step of any kind other than to take a little money out of the Treasury and invest it safely in the metal that has been one of the basic money metals through all the history of mankind?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. I understood that the Senator's proposal was that the Government should purchase the silver and issue certificates for it, those certificates to be redeemable either in silver or in gold.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would not that involve the same principle that we had in the Bland-Allison Act, under which the holder of a silver certificate might demand gold for it; and then, when that was paid out, come back and demand it again and start that circle of drawing gold out of the Treasury?

Mr. DILL. If any large amounts were involved—by "large amounts" I mean hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars—that would be true. If the circle method of drawing gold were used, the Secretary of the Treasury could withhold these certificates as cashed. I maintain, however, that $100,000,000 will be sufficient to take the surplus silver off the markets of the world and not endanger our financial system at the same time; and even supposing that everybody who secured a silver certificate went and demanded its redemption in gold, with enough gold down here to authorize $4,000,000,000 of new money, it seems to me there need not be any fear, but in any case the Secretary could withdraw the certificates cashed from circulation until the emergency was past.

Mr. FESS. Would there be any limit to the purchase of silver?

Mr. DILL. From my viewpoint, I would simply authorize the expenditure of $100,000,000 and leave it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. My own judgment is that it would never be necessary to spend the $100,000,000. I think, before we spent a hundred millions, silver would be back to 75 cents an ounce.

Mr. FESS. The Senator recalls that the act to which I referred, which President Cleveland called Congress in session to repeal, required the purchase and coinage of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 of silver a month.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That was not very much.

Mr. DILL. But I remind the Senator that we have no such basis of gold on a 40 per cent standard.

Mr. FESS. I say to the Senator frankly that if there were some international proposition whereby we could maintain some reasonable parity, I should be inclined to look with some favor on trying to use silver, but as matters stand it is difficult.

Mr. DILL. I want to make it clear to the Senator that I have not suggested that we peg the price of silver, but merely that we buy it in the market and let it take its natural rise due to the removal of silver from the markets of the world.

I did not intend to discuss this subject, but it is a subject which is extremely important, and I could not resist giving expression to my views, because it seems to me that we who sit here in the Senate have little realization of the despair in the hearts of the people of America to-day, of the hopelessness on the part of our farming population, and of the fear in the hearts of all those who have any property at all that it will not be worth anything a few months hence unless something is done to stop the ever-downward plunge of prices and the loss of confidence throughout America.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I understood the Senator, in answer to my question, to say that the redemption would be in gold only.

Mr. DILL. It could be in either metal, but of course it could be redeemed in gold. Suppose it were, however; suppose the one hundred millions in gold were all taken, when we have billions of gold here that are not earmarked. Why, Senators, all of our Federal reserve notes are backed by 40 per cent gold and not by silver, but by the notes given by those who borrow the money at the banks.

Mr. BROOKHART. I understand that proposition, but I did not understand how this money could be redeemed in silver at a changing price.

Mr. DILL. Of course, if the price changed, less ounces of silver would be necessary as the price went up.

Mr. BROOKHART. It would be a dollar's worth of silver, whatever the price was?

Mr. DILL. Certainly. There is nothing requiring the total amount of silver to be bought. The fact is, the reserve of silver would become more valuable as the price of silver rose.

Mr. BROOKHART. Upon that theory, we could issue a dollar based on fractions of the national wealth and have it redeemed in any commodity at the market price.

Mr. DILL. Of course, the Senator recognizes that when he makes that proposal he is immediately accused of proposing a fiat money. He is accused of proposing a money that the people can not be trusted to accept.

Mr. BROOKHART. That accusation is made by somebody who does not know what he is talking about, even though he happens to be the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DILL. There may be much in what the Senator says. Nevertheless, the people of the country are affected by the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, mistaken as they may be, and we must consider their effect, but neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor anybody else can question the soundness of the silver-certificate system which has been in operation in this Government now for generations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator perhaps is aware of the bill introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], authorizing the purchase of silver at the market and converting it into coin and issuing certificates against it at the rate of so many millions per month.

Mr. DILL. I am fully familiar with that proposed legislation, and I am strongly in favor of it. I am also familiar with the proposal of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who proposes that other countries may pay us their debts in silver, and that it be coined on the same basis. I am not in favor of the value he puts upon the silver from foreign countries, however.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that the Banking and Currency Committee have finished the hearings on the Pittman bill, and I hope they will be able to get action on it. I think that meets very much the idea that the Senator has been discussing.

Now, may I ask the Senator another question?

How would it appeal to the Senator if we were able to work out a plan whereby our surplus products—cotton, wheat, and so forth—might be sold to foreign countries for silver, and be paid for in silver? Would that help the situation?

Mr. DILL. I think that would naturally follow if the value of silver were increased. My whole purpose is to increase the value of the money which the people who would naturally purchase from us have to spend for our goods. The trouble now is that the money of these nations is so cheap that they can not buy in terms of the money which we use, and in which we price our products.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, we are considering a tax bill; and no amendment to that tax bill providing for a tariff is germane unless it is for the purpose of producing revenue. Nevertheless, we have introduced four major tariff items into this bill. We have introduced these four tariff items because it has been urged that certain industries are in need of protection. We have introduced in the bill an amendment for a tariff on oil because it is urged that the oil industry is in such straits that something must be done to improve its position.

So in the case of lumber. It has been urged here that the lumber industry in recent years has been in a deplorable condition. However, it is a fact that not only the oil industry, but the lumber industry, has enjoyed prosperity during the last 10 years, up to the time of this depression. Nevertheless, the lumber industry has asked for a tariff for its protection, that its income may be increased—not that the income of the Government may be increased—and we have granted it.

The copper industry has come to us for the same reason, urging that it was entitled to protection, that it needed aid, and we have given that industry what it asked.

Now it is suggested, when we ask something for agriculture, that there is no place in this bill for such legislation. True, we do not ask for a tariff, but we do ask that aid be granted to agriculture; and the proposed form of this aid is set forth in the amendment that has been offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. A bill similar to that amendment has passed the Senate in recent years. The Senate is familiar with it. It is not new. It has been discussed for several years. Furthermore, the debenture plan has been in effect in Germany since 1894. For a few years during the war it was suspended, but since the war the debenture plan has again been in effect in Germany. Also, the debenture plan was for a time in effect in Sweden. I do not know whether or not it is utilized there now.

This amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] provides that the debenture shall be limited to one-half of the tariff. Several years ago the Department of Agriculture made an estimate as to what it would cost the Treasury should the plan be adopted, and the amount then estimated was $114,000,000 a year. True, that would be a subsidy to agriculture; but agriculture needs it and is as much entitled to a subsidy as oil, copper, lumber, or coal, to which we have now assured indirect subsidies. This amendment is as germane to the pending tax bill as were these tariff amendments. So the question is, Are we going to do anything for the farmer in connection with this tax bill? Are we to listen to the copper industry, to the oil industry, to the coal industry, and to the lumber industry, but pay no attention whatever to the farmer?

The objection that this is a tax bill, and that we propose to add a nongermane amendment to this tax bill, is of no force in view of what we have already done in connection with this same tax bill. If we can afford relief to these other industries, we certainly ought to do something for agriculture, because there is no industry in this country that is suffering to the extent that the agricultural industry is suffering to-day.

As I have before stated on this floor, the farmer must now deliver two wagonloads of his products in order to buy what one wagonload would purchase in the 1909–1914 period.

Mr. President, as stated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives has recommended that the recapture clause of the 1920 transportation act not only be repealed, but retroactively repealed, and that would mean that we would hand over to the railroads $368,000,000, not as a subsidy, but as a gift.

When that recapture provison was introduced into the transportation act, it was at the suggestion of the railroads. It was their plan. They tacitly agreed to abide by that plan. But now, after paying in only some eight or nine million dollars, as required by law—and all of that paid in under protest so that it could not be used—after all these years have gone by, and they owe $368,000,000, they have lobbied a bill through the committee in the House to relieve them of paying this $368,000,000, notwithstanding the fact, that in the last nine years the Class I railroads paid $350,000,000 in dividends, and put aside about $250,000,000 in surpluses.

Mr. President, it seems that Congress can act favorably in behalf of nearly every other interest and industry except the agricultural industry. As a consequence, it is proposed to pass this tax bill, with these four tariff items in it for the relief of four industries, items which have no place in a tax bill; and naturally when it comes to adding to it a provision which would aid agriculture, it is urged that it should not be included because there ought not be added to this tax bill a farm-relief provision; that such a measure should be considered separately.

Mr. President, something ought to be done for the farm industry during this crop year. This debenture plan would do something. There is time to do something if it is added to the pending tax bill.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you, familiar with legislation, that there is great danger, if the amendment is not attached to some bill of this kind, that there will be no legislation in behalf of agriculture before the Congress adjourns. The debenture plan can be added to this bill and put into effect, without being subject to the objection that it would increase production this year. The crops are planted, it is too late to increase them, and the cost to the Treasury probably would not exceed $114,000,000 to $115,000,000, as was estimated by the Department of Agriculture for 1930–31.

That being the case, why should we not go at least that far in subsidizing agriculture? Tariffs are but subsidiaries of an indirect character.

Mr. President, something must be done for agriculture. Here is the opportunity and the opportunity to do it this year. This amendment has a place in this bill because of the precedent that has been established by the inclusion of tariff items in the bill. Hence, why should we not act favorably thereon?

We should also keep in mind that under the provisions of the amendment it will be put into effect only if the Farm Board deems it wise and necessary. By the same token, if at the end of this year it were found not to be wise and necessary, the board could desist from further application of the plan.

Therefore, Mr. President, we will merely be trying an experiment, an experiment which we are justified in attempting because of the tremendous interests at stake, for the prosperity of all this people is based fundamentally upon the prosperity of agriculture, and therefore it is of the greatest moment that agriculture be rescued, that the rest of our people may enjoy a return of prosperity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in this amendment and the discussion upon it. I feel, however, that it is absolutely unfair to continue to compromise with measures of this kind for the supposed benefit of agriculture.

For the last several years bills have been introduced in behalf of agriculture; in fact, such bills were offered before I became a Member of this body. The proponents of those measures have been willing to compromise and to get anything under heaven they could for agriculture. We have had compromise after compromise. The result has been that agriculture has gone from bad to worse, especially since the deflation started back in the good old Democratic administration in 1920.

The condition of agriculture has gone from bad to worse, and these compromise agricultural relief measures which have been presented have resulted in putting millions of farmers out of business, causing them to lose their farms and their homes. That condition exists at the present time. Farmers are still suffering from foreclosures. They are losing their property, their homes, the farms on which they have lived for years, which their families have faithfully worked to build up for a generation.

It is time we were getting away from compromise measures alleged to be in the interest of agriculture. I want to say now, Mr. President, that, judging from the letters I have received from farmers—not only farmers in North Dakota but farmers throughout the Middle West and some in the East and South—they are not in a frame of mind to accept compromises at the present time. They want real relief, they want some real assistance, they want something that will be of benefit to them, something that will help them save their homes, something that will enable them to get for their products prices equal to the costs of production. Unless they can get some such relief I believe the average farmer of the United States to-day would say, "We do not want compromise; we want real, worth-while legislation or nothing at all."

The pending amendment, embodying the debenture, is based on one-half of the existing tariffs. One-half of the existing tariffs, in addition to the present prices of farm products, would not begin to give the farmer cost of production for his products or anything like cost of production. Even the total amount of the tariff would not give the farmer cost of production at the present time. I think that if it is to be agreed to, the amendment should provide for at least the full amount of the tariff as the amount of the debenture.

Mr. President, I had not intended to make any remarks about the attitude of the administration toward agriculture, but that question was brought up this morning, and I think perhaps I might discuss it just a moment.

When the pending tax bill was reported to the Senate, several members of the Committee on Finance, which had the bill in charge, made the statement that the Secretary of the Treasury had come before the committee and had discussed the tax measure, and had made several recommendations, and that most of the proposed changes had been adopted, showing that the Secretary of the Treasury was vitally interested in the tax bill, vitally interested, according to some members, in cutting down the proposed increase in income taxes in the higher brackets and the surtaxes, placing the burden on a greater number of people and on those who, in my estimation, are not so well able to pay, but who are interested in the business affairs of the Nation nevertheless.

When the Glass-Steagall bill was before the Committee on Banking and Currency, I understand the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and advocated the bill. Prior to that time, when the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was under discussion, the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and advocated that measure as a relief for the banking interests, as the relief of the railroad and insurance companies of the country.

On the other hand, we have the Secretary of Agriculture, a member of the President's Cabinet, too, whose duty it is, at least it seems to me it is his duty, to look after the welfare of agriculture, to advise committees upon agricultural bills, and to put up a fight for the interests of agriculture. Unfortunately, we have not, in my opinion, such a Secretary of Agriculture at the present time, and I do not think we ever have had, at least not in recent years.

On March 3 the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], discussing some of the departments, referred to the present Secretary of Agriculture, and I want to read a paragraph appearing on page 5155 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day:

> I am not going to refer to the Secretary of Agriculture as did his distinguished fellow citizen, Jim Reed, of Missouri. Of course, Senator Reed had known him for many years. They were neighbors, fellow Missourians. Mr. Reed referred to him as "the steam whistle of a fertilizer plant." I do not go that far. I do not say that, because I have respect for the fertilizer plant.

[Laughter.]

I do not know that I want to go quite so far, either; but when we have had agricultural measures pending before the Committee on Agriculture, we have not had any real help from the Secretary of Agriculture. One such measure I introduced myself, S. 1197, to provide for refinancing the farmers, refinancing the existing farm indebtedness at the rate of 1½ per cent interest on the principal and 1½ per cent for amortization. The bill was sent to the Secretary of Agriculture asking for his opinion upon it. After some time and after a special effort was made to get a statement from him, we finally heard from him about it. I was chairman of a subcommittee that held hearings upon the measure. I wrote to the Secretary of Agriculture, telling him that hearings had been set and were about to take place and urging him for a statement upon the bill. The Secretary wrote back:

> It is my judgment that the bill which you inclose is not conducive to the best interests of the American farmer.
> Sincerely yours,
> ARTHUR M. HYDE, Secretary.

That was under date of January 30. On March 5 he wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in regard to the same bill and said:

> It is my judgment that this bill is hostile to the best interests of agriculture.

Mr. President, that bill provided for the liquidation of the present farm indebtedness at 1½ per cent, reducing the rate of interest from 6 or 8 per cent, as now paid, to 1½ per cent.

How any man who is interested in agriculture can say a measure of that kind is "hostile to the best interests of agriculture," how he can say it is "not conducive to the best interests of the American farmer," is more than I can understand. Reducing the rate of interest from 7 or 8 per cent, as now paid, down to 1½ per cent, the Secretary of Agriculture says would be hostile to agriculture and not conducive to the best interests of the American farmer.

Mr. President, if we had a Secretary of Agriculture who was willing to fight for the interests of agriculture, for the interests of the farmer, as is the Secretary of the Treasury willing to fight for the interests of the bankers, the railroad companies, and other big business of the country, we might get some legislation which was not a compromise in behalf of the American farmer. But under existing conditions we have been unable to get anything but compromises, and they have amounted to but very little.

Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. On page 4, line 5, strike out the word "one-half." That would make it provide that the—

Debenture rates in effect at any time with respect to any agricultural commodity shall be the rate of duty in effect at such time—

And so forth. I ask unanimous consent to offer another amendment to accompany it, because they relate to the same subject matter. On the same page, line 8, strike out the numeral "2" and insert the numeral "4," which would make the debenture rate on cotton 4 cents per pound instead of 2 cents per pound. I offer these amendments to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska and ask unanimous consent that they may be treated as one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendments of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Cutting	Johnson	Reed
Barbour	Dale	Jones	Robinson, Ark.
Barkley	Davis	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Bingham	Dickinson	Kendrick	Schall
Blaine	Dill	Keyes	Sheppard
Borah	Fess	King	Shipstead
Bratton	Fletcher	La Follette	Shortridge
Broussard	Frazier	Lewis	Smith
Bulkley	George	Logan	Smoot
Bulow	Glass	Long	Steiwer
Byrnes	Goldsborough	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Capper	Hale	McNary	Townsend
Caraway	Harrison	Moses	Tydings
Carey	Hastings	Neely	Vandenberg

Connally	Hawes	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Oddie	Wheeler
Costigan	Howell	Patterson	White
Couzens	Hull	Pittman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the two amendments of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the two amendments may be voted upon at the same time. Is there objection?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I would like to have the amendments stated, and I shall then ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendments be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes to amend the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, on page 4, line 5, by striking out "one-half" before "the rate of duty," and in line 8 by striking out the numeral "2" and inserting the numeral "4," so as to read:

(d) Debenture rates in effect at any time with respect to any agricultural commodity shall be the rate of duty in effect at such time with respect to imports of such commodity, except that so long as no import duty is imposed on cotton the debenture rate thereon shall be 4 cents per pound.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to voting on the two amendments as one? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from North Dakota asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt proceedings at this stage even for a few moments. I only do so in view of the fact that the pending general proposal is predicated upon the assumption that any tariff protection, whether high or low, as it is provided to-day, is recognized as a permanent, fixed, and unalterable policy of this country, and that this proposal is to aid one group of persons to secure their share, or at least some of their share, of the benefits and artificial advantages that are supposed to accrue to every individual in the country and to every class of individuals, provided they are able to secure it and to reduce it to possession.

I can not, Mr. President, acquiesce in the acceptance of that sort of policy. When we hear it said carelessly and loosely that if we are going to have a high tariff in this country we should therefore vote for this and vote for that in order to afford protection for Bill Jones and John Smith and every other Tom, Dick, and Harry who comes along and wants to acquiesce in the whole system, without any thought or real concern as to what it actually signifies in its economic effects, I think it is time that we should take occasion which this sort of opportunity suggests to take stock or to make some sort of a reexamination of the place our country occupies in the world's economic situation and the place that each group of citizens in this country occupies with respect to the different classes of legislation that are enacted from time to time by Congress.

If we are going to have tariff protection, some will say, "Let us have high protection"; others will say, "Let us have moderate protection"; and still others may say, "let us have merely tariff"; but all will say, "If we are going to have any of these things or all of them, then let us get in on it; let us put Bill Jones in on it; Bill is in trouble; he is in distress." Then the problem is to rake and scrape together any and all kinds of artificial devices and nostrums and methods that the imagination can possibly conjure up and prescribe them as an agency or a vehicle on which some neglected or abandoned or forgotten group may ride in and secure their share of either real or imaginary benefits that arise under different tariff laws.

To assume, Mr. President, that we are going to have tariff protection in this country means, from long experience, to assume that we are going to have high tariff protection; it means that we are going to have tariff protection written by the chief tariff beneficiaries; it means that we are going to have a perpetual operation of that unholy, ungodly, and corrupt combination between business and politics; that we shall have government through that kind of agencies on from generation to generation. It means, Mr. President, that we are to have inordinate, exorbitant, and hopelessly intolerable and almost unbearable tariff and tax conditions in this country, with their effects not only on the taxpayer directly but on our industrial, commercial, and entire economic situation, both domestic and international. I am opposed to passing carelessly by and accepting this sort of tariff policy with all its extremes and its excesses, with its complete domination not by the farmers, not by the American people generally, but by a small but powerful segment comprising the chief tariff beneficiaries.

It has been said that the poor farmer must fall back and take such crumbs as may drop from the table, so to speak, and that the only way he can even get the crumbs is to construct a clumsy scaffold such as the equalization fee law or the debenture proposal. Mr. President, I measure my words when I say that the 30,000,000 farm population of America can, within the next six months, take control of this Government, can take control of both Houses of Congress, and compel the enactment of any and all kinds of legislation they desire. They can compel their Senators and Representatives to walk away from the lobbyists of the great industrial concerns and to give heed to sound, equitable and decent economic policies and to legislate in the interest of American agriculture, as they did prior to the Civil War. Of course, we all know that, unfortunately, the Civil War divided agriculture half and half, with the result that American agriculture has never seriously attempted to unite and unify itself behind a common program of economics that would meet its rights and interests. It has permitted itself to be dragged along behind the chariot wheels of industry which has been in supreme and autocratic control of both politics and Government in this country.

Mr. President, if the farmers of America were willing to defy the politicians who go back and harangue them during every campaign until they succeed in getting back into office; if the farmers would demand a system of moderate or reasonable tariffs in this country instead of a system of embargo tariffs, a system of absolute prohibitions so far as any competitive or anything remotely or speculatively competitive is concerned; if the farmers would put forth their fiat that this Nation should adopt a tariff policy like that of Holland, of Sweden, of Belgium, and other nations that maintain low or moderate tariffs as compared with France, with Italy, with Germany, and with this country; if they would make their demands known, Mr. President, instead of cringing and cowering and caving in, so to speak, whenever the politicians go out with hothouse remedies to tide themselves over another campaign; if the farmers would read the riot act to the politicians and say, "We have been kicked and cuffed about over this country for two generations, blindly following the leadership of the chief tariff beneficiaries," who become millionaires in normal times almost overnight throughout the year, and then in turn go back to the impoverished farmer and buy up his abandoned farms and establish great plantations and hunting preserves; if the farmers should do that, if they should assert their rights and exercise their undoubted power, they could speedily secure the enactment of all legislation such as they are entitled to demand.

The time has come, in my judgment, Mr. President, when all these excesses—and any reasonable person is obliged to admit that our tariffs are filled with excesses; they are filled with exorbitant rates—the time has come when those excesses should be eliminated and when the American farmer ought to challenge that condition. Every sober-minded American ought to challenge that condition of rank excesses.

Mr. President, what is to become of this country if we continue blindly to go along the narrow economic path which we are proposing now to follow? We must inevitably reduce all our production practically down to the narrow scope of our ability to consume it here at home.

What is going to become of the cotton grower, who must find a market for from 40 to 50 per cent of his cotton in other countries? If the cotton grower hesitates or falters or listens to false counsel, he is going unerringly into a state of peasantry. The cotton grower, in my judgment, ought to set about to improve his efficiency to the highest possible state, in order that he may be able to produce the best possible quantity of middling cotton, and produce it at the lowest possible price. What the farmer needs is efficiency and low production costs, low living costs, low transportation costs, and low marketing costs.

The farmer hesitated with his cotton industry for a while, and we immediately saw Russia put out a new cotton crop in Turkestan; we saw an extension of cotton growing in Egypt and India, with the result that in one year they sold abroad more cotton than we were able to sell abroad for consumption purposes. But the very moment we set about to improve our quality of middling cotton we will cause it to be in demand as against the cheaper, the coarser, and the shorter cotton in every cotton market in the world. That is the salvation, as I see it, Mr. President, of the cotton farmer. Otherwise he must restrict production about 40 per cent and then peddle his cotton on the American market at prices fixed without his permission—at such prices as he can get.

The farmer is in no condition, he has suffered too much already, to undertake experiments. The farmer's level of prices, Mr. President, has decreased 54 per cent since the panic broke in early October, 1929, while the general level of prices of those commodities the farmer must buy has decreased only 32 per cent. There is an impassable gulf between the market situation of agriculture and of industry, and there must be some remedy other than of blindly and casually acquiescing in what somebody says to the effect that if we are going to have permanently a high-tariff policy, then the farmer by some artificial device only must share in it.

Mr. President, I want to repeat what I stated in undertaking to define the situation in 1929, which was while the Smoot-Hawley bill was pending. This was the statement I undertook to set out at that time:

> We condemn and denounce both the method of tariff making and the tariff policy pursued by the present dominant Republican leaders in close alliance with a small segment of industry, comprising the chief industrial tariff beneficiaries, under which the latter are permitted to dictate, primarily in their own interest, the present and the proposed extreme high tariff and narrow commercial policy of the Nation. That their revisions, always upward, are intended to promote domestic monopoly for themselves, while impoverishing other domestic industries and flouting foreign markets.

I said further:

> That the time has come for gradual and careful revision of these excessive industrial rates—by an uncontrolled Congress with the aid of an impartial fact-finding commission—to a level of moderate or competitive rates, rates so adjusted as to prevent conditions of domestic monopoly on the one hand and to avoid abnormal or unreasonable imports against efficient industries operating under normal conditions on the other—

And so on.

I am opposed to acquiescing permanently in a system of tariff taxation that is largely responsible for our present dislocated economic condition.

Mr. President, this proposal to recoup agriculture drives us at each step more and more in the direction of attempting to restrict production to just what we are able to consume here at home, as I have already indicated. The excess, of course, would be dumped somewhere, in some sort of way, if other nations would permit it; and it remains to be seen as to the extent to which other countries, which are watching us like hawks and fomenting the economic war which we have really instigated, will permit us to dump surpluses or to pursue a policy of bonuses or subventions on exports without retaliation and without resentment.

Of course, it would be easy enough if we could induce our farmers to restrain themselves and to accept some sort of an artificial device which would be guaranteed to give the American farmer more or less relief, while in the meantime this country goes forward for industry in the perpetuation of high and still higher tariff walls around our shores.

I do not believe that this Nation can progress in any definite, permanent, and safe manner from a business standpoint unless it halts and makes a real analysis of the underlying conditions, and adopts a program pertaining to our commercial and economic affairs that is calculated to lead us back to permanent and sound business recovery.

We can see very clearly that world conditions are tremendous factors in the present unreasonable delay of business improvement in this country. It is clear to any sane person that business people are not going to venture forward with large investments when they know that collapsed world conditions overnight may crash into and interfere with their business ventures, and pull them down and hold them down, and so prevent the Nation from going forward as a real, going, economic organization.

I think, Mr. President, that before we hurry to support artificial arrangements of any kind we ought to take stock and see really where we are heading, see where this great Nation is going with reference to other countries, and to what extent we are interdependent in our efforts to rehabilitate our economic situation.

My judgment is that the important nations could have a conference next week and take up the problem of price level and adopt policies that would be very potent in raising and restoring the present almost hopelessly collapsed commodity price level. We have our cotton and our wheat and our other primary commodities that are bought and sold in the international markets every day in the year at some price, and we must know that those prices are not fixed by us arbitrarily. They are fixed primarily by the law of supply and demand in the world market; and whatever we may attempt to do artificially to lift up and to hold up and to peg the prices of cotton or copper or zinc or lead or wheat or other products of world use and world consumption on a broad scale, our efforts are entirely puny and helpless.

I say, Mr. President, that we have ample time to sit down and deliberate on this matter, and analyze in a broad-gaged manner the extreme difficulties and the unusual complications that exist in our whole economic order, and agree upon a program that would deal practically, basically, and intelligently with those phases of our commodity prices that are so vitally affected by world prices, those phases of our international credit which have hopelessly broken down, and the restoration of which alone an economic conference will make possible, and the hopelessly tied-down exchanges, which prevent peoples everywhere from the ordinary international, financial, and commercial transactions, and which alone an international conference of farseeing, hard-headed business men and statesmen can solve and reveal to an anxiously awaiting public in this country and in other countries.

I say to you, Mr. President, that if we expect to get anywhere in dealing with this unprecedented panic condition, which is so deep-seated and so chronic in its devastating effects, we will not get anywhere by offering mere superficial propositions, nostrums, temporary palliatives, by whatsoever name they may be called. This is too serious and too deep-seated and permanent to be treated in that superficial, careless manner. It calls for the best brains that the most highly civilized nations can furnish to sit down here and brush away the demagogues, brush away the place hunters and the time servers who are always ready to array popular prejudice under the influence of distress incident to panics. The time is here, in my judgment, when this great body of statesmen ought to wake up and face these actual conditions and decide what is wrong, and whether we are going to adopt a policy of restricting all production in this country to just what we can consume.

If we are, then let us frankly say to the farmer that there is nothing left for him except to cut down his cotton production 40 per cent, to cut down his wheat production 25 or 30 per cent, to cut down his corn, to cut down his hogs, to cut down his oats and his rye and his tobacco, to cut down his hay, and all these other staple commodities that American agriculture, at the cost of great labor and immense toil, undertakes to bring forth from year to year. Let him understand that nothing is coming to him in this country in the future except in exchange for just such of his products as the American people in their own way see fit to consume.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. KING. I invite the able Senator's attention to the fact that Secretary Hyde and representatives of the Farm Bureau—and doubtless they were speaking for the present administration, including Mr. Hoover—have for a number of years insisted that we should produce less of agricultural commodities, that we should tear up one-third of the cotton crop, and that we should destroy one-half or one-third of certain other crops, anticipating that we were to adopt legislation that would destroy our foreign market, or rather that we were not to seek any foreign markets, and were to confine ourselves to producing only that which we consume, and consume everything that we produce.

I agree with the Senator that we are now at the parting of the ways. We shall either have to adopt the policy that will give us world trade and world commerce and make us a puissant and powerful international factor, or we shall have to draw into a circumscribed area and build a Chinese wall around ourselves, so that we will have no intercourse with the world.

The Senator is doing a great public service in challenging us to get out of our shell, and to look abroad, and to insist upon playing a man's part in a world that calls for the leadership of this Nation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, it is stimulating to hear the able Senator from Utah refer to certain patent facts and conditions which everyone must recognize. I think nothing is more clear than that the people of this country could not escape the responsibility and the duty of analyzing and interpreting the postwar economic situation as it has left us. It left us, as I sometimes say, the greatest creditor nation and the greatest exporting and trading nation in all history; and we were confronted and are now confronted with the inescapable duty of deciding definitely on a future economic policy—a policy that will operate successfully in the light of our place in the world economic situation.

The time has long passed when we might debate pre-war economic formulas or economic notions or policies that were prevalent without particular challenge before the war. It is utterly bootless for us to look back and undertake to discuss the pros and cons of economic policies before the war, when we were a young and a debtor and an undeveloped nation. Since then we have become a creditor nation, with vast surplus-producing capacity; and I lay down the rule, which I challenge any person successfully to controvert, that all of our products produced on a substantial surplus basis or a substantial exporting basis stagnate, prices fall, labor is thrown out of employment, and depression overtakes the industry unless our surplus finds a way to enter world markets on a profitable basis.

You may surround it by tariff walls as high as the moon, just as we have wheat surrounded, and whatever wheat sells for in the world market reacts back upon wheat in our domestic market. That is human nature. That is a law of trade. That is a part of our international market psychology which human experience everywhere confirms.

I repeat, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, we will be recreant to our plain duty unless we decide whether this country is to become a hermit country and order all of the different groups engaged in surplus production in every line to desist, to cut down their labor, throw it out of employment, or put it on three days a week, even though it does it only to reduce its productivity; and that is what generally happens, whatever number of days labor is placed on; or producers will be notified that we are not pursuing the doctrine of living by ourselves, with no concern about world markets, about international commerce, which, as we all say, constitutes the very lifeblood of civilization. We are going to take that course and legislate accordingly and boldly and courageously give leadership to the American people, or we are going to become the victims of fear of the chief beneficiaries of tariffs and other special privilege, whose blind and selfish and dumb leadership constitutes the biggest factor in the present-day world catastrophe. We are going to become subservient to their narrow leadership and to their sole concern for commercial profit, or we are going to assert ourselves, as the statesmen of America during the past generation have unhesitatingly asserted themselves, and give sound ideas and sound policies and competent leadership to the great American electorate. There is no escape from that situation.

I hope, Mr. President, that we will not be called upon hereafter to report at the office of the chief beneficiaries of the tariffs and other special privilege for orders when we come to deal with public affairs. I hope we will not be dragged out of one panic virtually into another by reason of their short-sightedness and selfish leadership that is without vision, that is without constructive ability, that does not look forward, that is utterly indifferent to all the high standards of human conduct, whether they be social, political, commercial, moral, or economical, in a broad and general sense.

The time is here when we should brush aside that sort of benighted position and leadership and go out before the country this year with a constructive analysis of just how this world panic came on, why it came on, and what were the dominant factors conducing mainly to this complete dislocation of the whole commercial and industrial and economic structure of the world; and then present to our fellow citizens what we conceive to be clean-cut, basic remedies, remedies calculated to inspire confidence among our business people, remedies which carry assurance to forward-looking industrialists and business men everywhere that they can depend upon stability, that they can depend upon sound and safe fiscal policies, sound and safe economic policies, policies which will not permit world conditions or any other unexpected outside conditions to crash in and dislocate our financial and general economic structure.

I desire to make this appeal, Mr. President, because I have grown weary of sitting around this Capitol for twenty-odd years and listening to the old song that everybody must bow down and listen to the chief beneficiaries of governmental favoritism in this country, that only they are competent to tell us what to do, that we must follow only them, and accept their advice.

Notwithstanding the disastrous experiences we have had in our efforts to follow them, nothing is clearer, in my judgment, than that under these new postwar industrial and commercial conditions, unless this great Nation becomes a trading nation, unless it utilizes its boundless resources, its materials, its manufacturing production, its trading opportunities, there is nothing left in this country except for agriculture, in the first place, to head straight down to a condition of permanent peasantry, to become the servants of industry, for the reason that all these plans and devices of favoritism which people come here and get from Washington in the way of legislative hand-outs and rake-offs, including tariffs, mean nothing more than a transfer of the property of a citizen who gets no tariff benefits, like the corn grower or the hog grower, to the citizen or manufacturer who does get tariff benefits, with the result that we have to-day a constant redistribution of property in this country.

All these artificial proposals mean that that redistribution shall go on until the chief population of the Nation reaches a condition of economic helplessness, and I am opposed to that. I am in favor of halting all this mad and half-crazy exaltation of what we call living to ourselves, what we call economic isolation, and what we are preaching everywhere. I am opposed to exalting that, and to teaching people everywhere that they can really live by themselves; that they can really produce surpluses and in some way get rid of them, here, there, or somewhere else. I am opposed to teaching what I consider such erroneous economic policies to the greatest creditor and surplus nation in all history, leaving the impression that we can go forward as though we were a provincial country, not producing enough foodstuffs to consume, not producing enough manufactured commodities for export, not producing surpluses in any important line above our capacity to consume. If anybody thinks we can go forward in that way, without stagnation and falling of prices and inability to transfer goods and capital between nations, we only have to attempt further pursuit of the identical course we were following when we plunged into the world panic in October, 1929.

We will find inevitably that for a creditor and a surplus-producing country on the huge scale and magnitude of ours to pursue such a course will mean insecure and unsound business foundations from year to year as we go forward; we will find that business is in a lopsided condition; that monetary instability is rising from year to year, to confuse and demoralize our industrial and commercial affairs; and we will find that about every half dozen years this Nation will plunge into a new panic, as it did in 1929, after it had emerged from the panic of 1923, equipped with every possible agency to safeguard it and guarantee it against a repetition of a panic similar to that of 1921–1923.

It is not possible for a great overproducing nation, with a great surplus of credit and gold, to maintain the gold standard or to maintain monetary stability and at the same time produce up to a normal level and to ship and sell its surpluses at a profitable return in order to give employment here at home to our capital instead of exporting gold.

If we are to give employment to our capital instead of exporting it, if we are to give our manufacturers a chance to produce instead of transferring their plants in the form of branches or otherwise to all the other nations of the world, if we are to give American labor full employment at high wages, with high living standards, we must find ways to sell our surpluses; and if in lending $28,000,000,000 during recent years we are not able to find markets for our surpluses, then we ought to be kicked off the face of the earth, because it would be due to utter incapacity and utter stupidity and cupidity if we should sit here with our merchant marine, with our credit advantages, with our Panama Canal, with our loans running into the billions, and pusillanimously admit that we were not able to sell our surpluses, that we are suffering from a great glut of excess of production, which inevitably results in falling prices, in every sense setting back the great industrial conditions of this country.

Mr. President, I could not refrain from offering these remarks, in view of the new and wholly unusual condition that confronts the American people with respect to their industrial and commercial and economic affairs. I could not refrain from making an appeal to my colleagues, which I hope is void of any vestige of partisanship, to stop and examine these conditions and to decide whether or not we are under serious obligations to prepare a modernized program and present it to the American people, instead of falling back to those hopeless and antiquated and archaic formulas about economics, and through them endeavoring to lull to sleep American agriculture and all the victims of favoritism which certain groups are accustomed to come here and demand and receive ad libitum.

With all due respect to any of my colleagues who differ with me, I am opposed to any economic policy that contemplates exclusive advantages to any individual or group of individuals in this country. If I vote for the debenture plan, which I oppose in principle, it will be solely upon the theory of fighting the devil with fire. I am also opposed, of course, as many of us have said, to what might be called absolute prohibitions. In many countries to-day they have what they call the quota system, which has been carried to such extremes that a government abroad will not only say how much of a given import can be brought in, but from which nation it shall be purchased, to the exclusion of other nations.

I am opposed, of course, to the policy toward which we are steadily gravitating, and that is a more and more autocratic method of dealing with the international, financial, commercial, and general trade situation. I am opposed to that phase of it which prescribes absolute embargoes, embargoes just as complete as any embargo rate that can be found anywhere in the Smoot-Hawley bill. They all embody the same principle. They all embody the same economic philosophy.

So long as we proceed to play up agriculture with tariffs and play up industry with tariffs, vying with each other as to who can raise the rates the highest, with one group in Congress exalting the rates of industry or manufacture and undertaking to hold down the rates of agriculture, and another group facing them and exalting the rates of agriculture and undertaking to hold down the rates of industry or manufacture, naturally both finally get what they want and both finally adopt the same philosophy, economically speaking. But agriculture gets only paper rates. The result is that excesses are indulged in, and other countries follow suit, either by way of retaliation or by example, and finally the world finds its entire economic structure badly and severely dislocated.

It is against these possibilities, against these conditions that I am protesting. I am in favor of moderation with respect to all these policies, moderation as to commercial policy, moderation as to obstructions to imports by all the nations in order that we may exchange our surpluses, in order that we may give capital and labor and agriculture full leeway in this country with high living standards and high earnings at home.

Mr. President, I had intended to offer two or three amendments relating to certain phases which I have discussed, but for the present I shall await some expression from some of my colleagues who differ with me. I would like very much to ascertain some concrete reasons in support of the narrow and blind and deadening policy of what we call economic isolation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I share very generally the Senator's views on the tariff. While I deplore very greatly and hold that there is no possible excuse or reason for some of the schedules and some of the items in what is known as the Smoot-Hawley bill, still I have thought, as I thought at the time the vote was taken, that it was an improvement over the 1922 act, principally because it undertook to make provision for agriculture.

Whatever we may say about the tariff, the Senator will admit that we do have a protective tariff in this country, and it has been in operation a great many years so far as industries are concerned. Under that tariff agriculture has never had any fair show or fair treatment. We attempted to remedy that to some extent in the tariff act of 1930, but even that has not been effective. The question now is, How are we to place or approach placing agriculture on the same level with industry as to our tariff system and under our tariff laws—tariff benefits, if you please? That seems to me to be the main question. Whether or not the Senator would disapprove of the tariff laws as affecting industry, ought we not to attempt in some way to apply the same rule to agriculture that we do to industry under the tariff laws?

Mr. HULL. I appreciate the Senator's interruption and the spirit in which he speaks. I would say in reply, from my own viewpoint, whether it is sound or unsound, that any nation having agriculture that is producing on an exporting basis presents a situation where agriculture is at a hopeless disadvantage in competing with manufacturing industry for tariff benefits. In countries like France and Germany, where the farmers do not produce enough to meet the domestic consumption of their fellow citizens and their home population, they are in a position to go and demand every farthing of their relative share of tariff benefits; but in our country our farmers are unfortunately on an exporting basis as to 90 per cent of the acreage planted to crops in this country. Their tobacco is on an exporting basis, as are their wheat, their corn, their hogs, and all their hog products, their oats, and most of their staple commodities. Even wool has fallen 40 per cent in this country, although we do not produce enough for our home consumption.

I suggest this observation first, that our farmers can not hope to secure what is called economic equality so long as they are on a substantial surplus-producing or exporting basis as to their chief productions. That, I think, has been demonstrated by human experience and that is why I plead for moderation instead of letting our industrial friends come here and dictate more than once.

During the 22 years it has been my privilege to sit on tariff-making committees at one end of the Capitol or the other, I have occasionally sat down with a Republican friend of mine and we have been able to agree on what would constitute a proper tariff rate on a given article. But the next week a manufacturing beneficiary, who had put up a good-sized campaign fund for some political party, would come to Washington and say, "Thirty-five per cent which you people suggest is not what we want. We want 65 per cent," and 65 per cent would be approved before the tariff bill makes its way through the Capitol.

It is these excesses about which I complain. I think I have a right to appeal to my colleagues, regardless of political persuasion, to join and halt these ever-increasing excesses that creep into our whole legislative situation. Then we would be able to face in the direction of moderation. We have been in the habit of permitting business to come here and make assurance of its needs for relief, and we would then prescribe rates for the entire industry, which includes the efficient as well as the inefficient part of the industry.

We have had that kind of abuses and our good friends on the Tariff Commission have that psychology. They have that slant in the direction of ultrahigh tariff philosophy. They honestly believe that whenever anybody makes the slightest complaint they should soon get busy and find some set of figures upon which to base some favorable action. I think it is inexcusable when we look around at our methods of tariff making. Just a few days ago I noticed where the Tariff Commission had frankly admitted that it was unable to ascertain foreign costs in six out of seven cases which it had reported to the President. In other words, we have carelessly adopted or carried along that yardstick of difference in cost of production, with the result that in 9 cases out of 10 nobody pretends that the facts can be ascertained as to foreign cost, so that we have the unfortunate condition of the Tariff Commission sending out its clerks to get the figures about invoice value and from them infer the foreign costs, and on that basis our entire tariff revision or policy and action is based.

I am opposed to that. It is not fair. It is not justified. From my viewpoint if we would liberalize our commercial policies and let business everywhere understand that as we become independent economically we would gradually unfetter ourselves, we would soon have a far healthier state of business prosperity in this country than we have been accustomed to have. We would have ready markets for our surplus exports, and we would employ all our American labor at good wages in this Nation, instead of seeing plants by the thousands take their flight to other countries and billions of American capital taking its flight to other countries, while 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 American people are thrown out of employment here, and our agricultural population come here looking for a hand-out, which it is told will place it on an economic equality with those industrial producers who are able to reach out and take in their tariff benefits to the extent of 100 per cent.

That is the situation, and I apologize for having consumed the time of the Senate to venture to inject the impressions and opinions I entertain in that respect.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there can be no doubt the world is in dreadful health. The worst of it, the doctors do not agree as to why the world is in this condition and certainly are not agreed as to what should be done to relieve the disease. In my profession I have witnessed a similar state of affairs in the sick room. A patient has had an ailment, and it is apparent he is very sick, but there is no agreement on the part of the doctors as to what is the matter with him and less agreement as to what should be done about the case.

America is in the unfortunate position of being without a single friend in the family of nations. We have no friends. Perhaps we do not deserve to have. Anyhow, it is perfectly natural for a nation to hate another one to which it owes money, as the individual hates the man to whom he owes money. The nations of the world are in debt to us. They can not pay. They do not understand our attitude toward their predicament. In consequence they have no feeling of friendliness for us, and we have not promoted a spirit of friendliness on their part by our various tariff legislative acts. I am not finding particular fault with those acts. I have had a part myself in putting into various tariff bills items which were of interest to my locality; but, nevertheless, because of these acts, we have alienated still farther the good will of foreign nations.

Then, Mr. President, we have our own domestic distress. If I diagnose the situation rightly, the people living in the industrial centers and in the financial centers are in exactly the same frame of mind in which the farmers have been for the past 10 or 15 years. In the cities the people have not been used to this sort of thing; in the country the farmers are getting hardened to it, perhaps. Because of the fact that the city dwellers are now feeling the pressure and the stress and the strain of economic disaster, there is a hysteria of desire on the part of those living in the industrial and business centers to have something done to bring relief and to bring it speedily.

Some of us who live in the great centers of population have long espoused the cause of the farmer. We have seen, or thought we could see, the necessity of restoring his buying power. I have said in speeches a hundred times in New York City that unless the farmer can have his buying power restored, there will be bread lines in the cities, and there are bread lines in the cities. One of the reasons why there are such bread lines is that the farmers can not buy the things which are made in the cities.

Mr. President, it is very easy to take a "Pollyanna" attitude and to say that everything is going to be all right. I read as patiently as I can the hundreds of letters I receive telling me what is wrong with the Congress, how bad we are. At the same time they tell me how necessary it is that we balance the Budget; how necessary it is that we should have a moderate tax bill; how necessary it is that we should have a sales tax; how important it is that there should be found ways of raising revenue that will not put undue pressure upon the country, but at the same time will restore the country to prosperity.

Mr. President, I think it is a good idea once in a while to tell the country the truth. In my judgment, what we are going to do here between this time and the adjournment, while it may produce a certain psychological benefit for a few weeks, will not solve the distress of the American people. I know when I say that I am going against the conviction of thousands of good citizens who think that the recovery of the country is retarded by the slowness of Congress to act and that prosperity will be restored the minute Congress adjourns, having balanced the Budget, as we are undertaking to do. There will be no such recovery because of our adjournment. I know there will be a sense of relief. I think the people of the United States feel toward Congress about as the nations of Europe feel toward the United States. They do not like us. Somehow or other we are associated with all their troubles. We are associated in their minds, at least, with all the distressing conditions from which they suffer; and many of them believe that when we adjourn, having balanced the Budget, all of the troubles of the country will disappear.

They will not disappear, Mr. President. The causes of this great national and international depression are far beyond any relief that we can afford by legislative act.

It was only a few weeks ago that the country was demanding that the Glass-Steagall bill be passed. It was demanding that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill should be passed. The belief was held by our people that when those measures relating to the fiscal policy of the United States should be enacted into law, business would be restored. Those bills were enacted into law, but business was not restored.

There was the same enthusiasm for a few weeks, the same phychological effect that is going to flow from the passage of pending measures, including the economy bill, and from the adjournment of Congress, but the causes of the Nation's distress will be here just the same. We may relieve some of the symptoms that are annoying, some of the conditions which are really superficial, but the fundamental defects will be here just the same.

How can we hope, Mr. President, to have a recovery of business in the United States when the bankers hoard in their vaults the money of the Nation? If I were a banker, I would not take any pride in saying, "My bank is 85 per cent liquid." To my mind it is just as absurd for a banker to say that his bank is 85 per cent liquid as it is for a hospital to say, "85 per cent of our beds are empty," when there are a thousand persons applying for admission. It never was intended that banks should be liquid. What is the use of piling money up in the banks unless that money is to be used and turned over in industry and in business? The banks are hoarding their money. A year ago there was a great campaign to get the people to stop hoarding money that was hidden under the mattress or put in the teapot. It was said, "If we get that money out of these hidden places and into circulation, prosperity will come." Is it any different, Mr. President, for banks to hoard their money than it is for individuals to hoard their money? I fail to see the distinction.

The President may appoint commission after commission; he may take pride in the fact that a great group of men in my city recently organized a committee to help pour out credit. I pray to high heaven that that committee may succeed; but until the banks of America function as banks should, there can be no return of prosperity.

We are now called upon by the plan of the President—and when I mention him I am not doing so by way of criticism; I am simply dealing with the facts as they are—to provide by legislation that a large amount of money, under control of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, shall be used to aid industry. Mr. President, why should a corporation established by Congress be used to aid industry? What are the banks for? We passed legislation to assist the banks in order that they might aid industry. Why do they not do it?

Now we have this bill before us. It is an essential piece of legislation; it must be passed in some form. I want it passed; I intend to vote for it. As one Member of the Senate, without criticism of any of my fellows, I have felt incensed that there were put into this bill items relating to tariff schedules, items which have no more business to be put in this bill than they have to be put in the collection box at church next Sunday.

This is not a tariff bill; nobody contends that we are going to derive revenue from these tariff items. I will join with others in a limited revision of the tariff at the proper time. There are industries in my State which I think need help. It does not make me happy, Mr. President, to know that 10,000 men and women who normally work in the sugar refineries of New York are now without work because of the lack of a proper differential between raw sugar and refined sugar. My heart goes out to them. I plead with the Senate two years ago for a tariff on gypsum. There are great mines of gypsum in the western part of New York, where miners for generations have been bringing up the gypsum from the depths of the earth. But, for my part, I have resisted every single appeal to put into this bill anything relating to the tariff. I did so because I had a conscientious conviction that they did not belong here.

I do not look with favor upon the alliance which made possible the incorporation in the bill of the tariff items which have gone into it. They ought not to have gone in. I have voted and shall continue to vote against every single item relating to tariff schedules, even though I may feel that a given item is of interest to my State, because I think it is improper to include tariff items in this bill.

Mr. President, because of that conviction, I am embarrassed by the presentation of the amendment offered by our distinguished friend, the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I voted for the debenture plan. If it were before us now independently of this bill, separated from these tariff items, I would vote for it again; but, Mr. President, I have the feeling that it would be no kindness to the farmers of America to vote the debenture into this bill, because the prejudice of certain factions in the Congress is such that in all human probability the debenture would disappear in the conference.

If I am led or forced into voting against the debenture, I want it to be understood by the farmers of my State—and we stand eighth in agriculture—I want it understood by the farm groups of the country generally, that my vote is not intended as a vote against anything which will help agriculture. But I do not want the farmers of America to join the unholy alliance which has put in this bill items which have no business there, items which will add to the cost of business, the cost of agriculture, and which will place another burden upon the American people.

If the copper tariff had been considered here by itself, I should have pointed out the fact that 200 items, articles in common use, will have a corresponding tariff increase by the wording of the bill in order to meet the tariff upon the raw material. The inclusion of these tariff items in the bill will add to the burden of our people at a time when that burden should be lightened and not increased.

So, Mr. President, I should be sorry to see the farmers made a party to this unholy combination.

In saying that I am not unmindful, as I have already said, of the great distress of American agriculture. There can be no doubt of that distress. I do not know anything about cotton or tobacco. I know nothing about corn. I know something about wheat. I know that the Canadian wheat grower, with his fertile soil, can grow 50 per cent more wheat upon his acreage than the American farmer can grow. Much of the wheat land in Canada is virgin soil, rich and productive. It will grow 50 per cent more wheat per acre than our depleted lands will grow. I know that the initial cost of the Canadian land, the investment of the farmer, is far less than the investment of the American farmer in wheat lands. I know that the labor costs in Canada are less than they are in the United States. Beyond that is the fact that the nationally owned railroads of Canada have nailed to their charter a requirement that those railroads should make a rate on wheat from Saskatchewan and Alberta to the lake head which is materially less than the rate charged on wheat from Montana to Duluth.

How can the American wheat farmer hope to compete with the Canadian wheat farmer with less interest charge, with less labor cost, with greater productivity, with lower freight rates? How can the American wheat farmer hope to compete with the Canadian farmer under those conditions?

In the next place, we can not disregard the fact that blood is thicker than water. Liverpool is the wheat center of the world, and the English will buy from the Canadians before they will buy from the Americans. Unless there can be found some means of practical relief for the wheat farmers of America, they are crushed, and crushed forever.

As I have said, I do not know about cotton, tobacco, corn, or pork. I have no doubt that the things I have said about wheat apply to those other farm products.

What are we going to do for the farmer? Mark my words, Mr. President, we must do something for the American farmer that will better his condition or he will become worse than the serf and peasant of the Old World ever were. We might just as well face these facts as sane and sensible men. The buying power of the farmer must be restored. If there is any sort of legislation that will be effective, either the allotment plan or the debenture plan or the equalization fee, we must give the farmer the benefit of an enactment that will make it possible for him to make use of this method of marketing his product.

For my part I have always had faith, and have faith now, in the equalization fee. A flexible, varying fee, suited to the year and the season, has in it, as I see it, soundness from an economic standpoint, and success in practical operation. I do not care what the method is, however. If there is a method which will make it possible for the farmers of America to sell their products at something beyond the actual cost of production, the farmers of America are entitled to that relief.

Ah, Mr. President! I wish we could find a way to solve all these problems that face us. We have the question of the international debts. Sometimes I get a little provoked at the newspapers because they do not fully quote me, and I suppose other Senators do. I saw a roll of the Senate a few months ago which told about what Senators were in favor of cancellation and what Senators were in favor of full payment and what Senators were in favor of a moratorium. I found my name in a list of those in favor of cancellation.

I am not in favor of cancellation. These debts are due us. We are entitled to be paid. We never will be, but at least we are entitled to be paid.

But, Mr. President, we are a peace-loving people. We want to impress upon all the countries of the world our desire for peace. I have enough confidence in the character of other nations to believe that they want to pay their debts, too. If I had my way, I would have the nations sit down around a table, and I would say to them, "You owe us so much money. We are not going to cancel that debt; but year by year we will cancel the interest and principal payment due that year, provided you give us evidence that you have reduced your expenditure for armament to that extent; and then next year, if you do the same thing, we will cancel further." At the same time that the nations of the earth disarm we in our turn can disarm. We can not disarm before.

Mr. President, those who say, "Let the United States take the lead in destroying its Navy and doing away with its guns and reducing its Army" are indeed idealists. We can not do those things which make for permanent peace until we are joined by the nations of the earth in doing the same thing, in carrying out their part of the same program.

I have no doubt that our relationship with other nations would be improved if we had that understanding. The hatreds which they have for us now would not be so great. But, Mr. President, we ought not at this moment, by any enactment of ours, to indicate our unfriendliness to other nations. So I say that this is not the time, this is not the occasion, for us to do anything relating to the tariff.

I have believed, and I believe now, that the Tariff Commission can be extremely useful to us.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. We respect very much the advice of the Senator from New York. Does he think that the debenture plan connected with this tariff bill would be a good thing?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if this debenture plan were before us as an independent thing, unassociated with the "unholy alliance," of which we have heard, I would vote for it. As I said a little while ago, I have faith in the equalization fee; but I do not think this is the time to attempt to solve the problem of the farmer by putting into this bill even a second cousin to the tariff items which are in it.

Mr. President, I am not going to say more. I know that there has been a vein of pessimism in what I have said; and I do not want to have the figure of speech which I use now forced into a wrong application.

It is always the duty of the doctor to tell the family the truth if the disease is serious, and perhaps likely to take the life of the patient. I do not want a forced application made of that. I do not believe that America is going to die, or that the world is going to be destroyed; but I think the country should be told, and told frankly, that there is not in this bill, there is not in the balancing of the Budget and in the economy measure which we must enact, any hope of recovery from the depression in which we are.

Mr. President, that makes no difference. It is our duty anyhow to do these things, unpleasant as they are. No man likes taxes. I come from the State which pays one-third of all the taxes of our country. When we raise $3,000,000,000 in taxes, my State pays $1,000,000,000 of those taxes. There is no State in the Union which will feel more the effect of the taxes which we provide for than my State. But that makes no difference. The taxes provided for in the pending bill must be levied, and they must be paid, and if they are burdensome to my constituents I am sorry.

The economies we demand must be accomplished, but, as I have said before, after we have done all these things, after we have passed the tax bill, after we have passed the economy bill, after we have passed the greatly reduced appropriation bills, our country will still be in the morass of distress and economic trial.

Every citizen of the United States owes it to his country now to do everything he can to bring it back to prosperity. There rests an unusual burden upon those who control the fiscal policy of our country. In all frankness, Mr. President—once more I go back to my own city—I say in all frankness that the bankers of the United States are not doing their duty. We must be aroused in our country, and no citizen should be more aroused than the banker. The trouble is not with the small banker or the small bank. The trouble is away up at the top, so far up that the group in charge is an invisible group, an oligarchy, an invisible oligarchy, controlling the welfare and the fate and the future of the United States.

Mr. President, there must be made an effective appeal to that invisible oligarchy. We can not have our country broken and destroyed because of the attitude of a few men. We should make the appeal to that group to send down word through the big banks to the smaller banks, and so on, to the little banks, in order that the fear which now governs all bankers may be relieved, and that the banks will function as they ought to function.

Mr. President, money is the blood of the Nation. The life of the individual depends upon the circulation of the blood within his body. Unless these banks function so as to circulate the money of our Nation, our Nation must continue to suffer from anæmia as it is suffering.

I hope no citizen of the United States will be misled into thinking that the fault lies in Congress, that we are to blame for the failure of the restoration of business in the United States. It is not our fault. It may be our fault that we delay some things. It would be our fault, and a serious one, if we were to fail to pass pending measures. But in the last analysis the trouble is not here. The trouble is with the invisible oligarchy. Until the money is permitted to flow, there can be no money for the industrial plants, there can be no money for the movement of crops, there can be no money to finance the farmer.

Mr. President, the cause for this ailment of ours lies far beyond this Chamber, far beyond anything within our power to correct.

When I rose in my place, I had no thought of saying all these things. It can readily be believed that I will be bitterly criticized in high place for what I have said. But beyond the pleasure of having the good will and the kind words of those in high place, I would rather see my country restored to prosperity. I want to do everything I can, of course, but the people themselves, outside of the Congress, have a solemn responsibility resting upon them. They must use their influence to see that those who have it in their power to restore confidence and to restore floods of money into the marts of trade render the assistance which they are capable of giving.

I am not at all satisfied to have it charged against the Senate that its dilatory action and its failure to enact measures are responsible for the conditions which exist. They are not. Nevertheless, it is our duty to pass the pending bill, and I hope we may speedily send it to the President for his signature.

Let me express again my regret that because of my attitude toward the matter of tariffs I doubt exceedingly whether I can bring myself to vote even for a thing which is apparently so desirable as the debenture.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Has the Senator any doubt at all that practically every dollar this bill is supposed to bring in will ultimately have to be paid, in the larger part, by the wage earners and the farmers of this country?

Mr. COPELAND. Undoubtedly it will.

Mr. SMITH. Very well. The Senator has taken quite a good deal of time, as have others who have preceded him, to reiterate what we all know, that the farmers of this country almost universally are bankrupt and ruined. When we consider that wheat has dropped from more than a dollar a bushel to about 25 cents and that cotton has dropped from 25 or 30 cents a pound down to about 5 cents a pound and that livestock does not bring enough to pay the freight to get it to market; that as to one item alone, namely, cotton, the difference between what was obtained for it and the cost of production in one year amounted to $800,000,000, does the Senator feel justified in voting for the pending tax bill, to balance the Budget, which will impose a burden of a billion dollars additional on the already unspeakably oppressed agricultural class, without carrying along with it in some shape or form the possibility of enabling the farmer to meet that burden which inevitably, under the law of gravitation, will be found resting on him?

The Senator said we ought to pass the bill and let it go into operation, a bill which would extract from the already distressed people of our country a billion dollars. Would the Senator make no provision, contemporaneously with passing that bill, for aiding the farmer in some way, somehow, to meet this additional obligation we will lay upon him?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before I answer the Senator's question, I want to ask him one. The Senator from South Carolina has an unblemished record as regards his attitude toward the tariff. Not in all the years I have been associated with him have I known him to vote for any tariff, regardless of how he might think it might be of some temporary benefit to his State.

I want to ask the Senator a question not for the purpose of controversy but because I am sorely distressed. I have been so outraged by the inclusion in this bill of these extraneous subjects, things which had no business going into the bill, that I made a solemn declaration that I would not vote for any tariff, no matter what it was. The Senator has a record so unblemished that I want to ask him now whether, in all good conscience, he can vote for this amendment?

Mr. SMITH. This is not a tariff amendment. This is exactly along the line of the measure I tried to make plain to the Senate the other night we ought to enact.

Mr. COPELAND. If it is not a tariff, it is the "reverse English" of it, then.

Mr. SMITH. If you by law force me to pay a dollar a unit more for an article than the price for which I could have gotten it otherwise, you are in duty bound to provide me the means of paying that extra dollar. In other words, if by the imposition of a tariff you force me under the law to pay more for an article than I would without the tariff have had to pay, if you have a sense of democratic justice, you will provide me with the means of acquiring the extra amount I would have to pay.

The principle of the debenture is this, that there are these unorganized farmers in our country who have no reserve power. They are individualists. But their aggregate products are the hope and life of America. We have forced them to pay a tribute to organized and protected industries in the prices they pay for whatever they must purchase. We can not justify ourselves in that. But we will do this, we will take away from these protected individuals enough of that which they get and turn it over to those who have had to pay the extra amount for their products, not on account of any lobbying activity on the part of the farmer, but out of a sense of justice. We say, "We are not protecting you; we are simply keeping the protected individuals from taking from you that to which they are not entitled." It is the reverse of the protective tariff. If the policy of protection is carried to its logical conclusion, we could take from the protected every dollar of profit they have and distribute it amongst the unprotected.

The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has introduced a bill which illustrates the point I am making. He provides in that bill that where any agricultural export product has to be sold in the free markets of the world such product may be exchanged by barter abroad for articles needed by the exporting farmer and that these articles may be brought to the American exporting farmer free of duty.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It practically provides for foreign trade by barter in our export products, foreign articles so acquired to be delivered to the exporting farmer without tariff charge.

Mr. SMITH. By barter. Therefore, this amendment is nothing more nor less than that principle applied in practice.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My measure is intended to meet existing emergencies and is to terminate when farm prices shall have been restored to parity with American manufactured products.

Mr. SMITH. If we can not reach the farmer—and we can not reach him by this nefarious, unholy, unjustified principle of a protective tariff—if we can not reach him, and he is a citizen of this country, we are in duty bound to recompense him for the injustice done him. That is the position I take.

Mr. COPELAND. "Almost thou persuadeth me," may I say to the Senator from South Carolina. I have been terribly distressed over this matter. I have talked with my charming and beloved seat mate [Mr. GEORGE]. I have talked with my leader [Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas] about it. I want to do the right thing. I know the farmer is ruined if we do not do something for him, but I am afraid the bill we have before us is ruined if we insert the debenture plan.

Mr. SMITH. Let me change the phraseology for the Senator. He said the farmer is ruined if we do not do something for him. The farmer is ruined, and we had better do something for him. That is where the thing stands now. There is no question of "if" about it.

Mr. KING. Is not everybody ruined?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. Sometimes I think we are coming at last to a realization of the really vital part the farmer plays in the economic structure of our country. For the first time in the history of the country we get no revenue and get no trade from the agriculturalists for the reason that there never was a time in all the history of organized society and civilization when wealth was so powerful and poverty so helpless as to-day.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is true.

Mr. SMITH. The things wealth can get by an expression of its power are infinitely greater and more numerous than 40 years ago. Any man that holds the labor of an automobile and has the price to pay multiplies his individual power to every horsepower expressed in that vehicle; and by the same token, as wealth gathers unto itself power, just by the law of comparison poverty sinks that much deeper in the scale of organized society.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator speaks the truth, but I want to ask him this question. In my State we make a good deal of fish oil. It is used in making soap. That industry feels that it is terribly hampered and its very existence threatened by foreign competition. If I should be willing to vote for the debenture, which is a sort of reverse English on the tariff, certainly a second cousin to it——

Mr. SMITH. No; I do not think it is related at all. I think it is a necessity growing out of the farmer calling for merely simple justice.

Mr. COPELAND. My fish-oil man would say that his necessity is such that he must have a tariff to cut out foreign competition in order that he may sell his fish oil. What am I going to say to him if he hears that I voted for a debenture which is going to assist the farmer and then tell him I am not able to vote to put a tariff on fish oil?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I may say to the Senator from New York that when the pending amendment has been voted upon, I have an amendment already printed which I intend to offer immediately, which will take care of the fish oil of the Senator from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is a tempter! Mr. President, I must not detain the Senate longer. I shall attempt to keep an open mind on the matter of the debenture, hoping all the time that I may be convinced that it is wise to vote for it. I do know that the farmer must he helped. There must be found some way to relieve his distress or our whole economic system is going to break down. His is the basic industry, and without prosperity on the farm there can be no prosperity anywhere.

I want to do what I can to help the farmer. When he is happy the Nation thrives. His fate is the fate of all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Schall
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the debate on the pending amendment has been somewhat prolonged and there is no intention on my part to defer the vote longer than is necessary to state the conclusion which I have reached after a somewhat full consideration of the subject.

It is still my opinion that a great mistake was made when the Senate consented to the consideration of tariff items in the pending bill. The author of the pending amendment and others here foresaw that such a policy would invite issues which necessarily would delay the passage of the revenue bill.

It seems to me pertinent to state also that the main consideration underlying the adoption of tariff items has not been to obtain revenue but to secure protection for the interests affected by the various amendments proposed. Of course, there is a probability that a limited amount of revenue will be derived from the various articles upon which duties are imposed, and certainly from some of them; but if there is anyone here who doubts the primary consideration is to secure protection rather than revenue, I think there are abundant facts and arguments to convince him that his belief is unfounded.

It would be easy to force this amendment into the bill and thus bring about a condition that would delay indefinitely the enactment of revenue legislation; and there has been provocation for that course; but the conclusion which I have reached, after listening to the arguments, is that such a result is still to be avoided, if it is possible to do so.

This Congress can not complete its labors without giving consideration to legislation affecting the agricultural industry; but it is my conclusion that it is unwise to attempt to attach such legislation to this bill, for the reason that, in all probability, it will not become effective. Within the last few minutes the able Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has announced his purpose to propose a tariff protection amendment in some form, and without doubt there are numerous others to be presented. If those primarily charged with responsibility for this legislation insist upon a revision of the tariff on a revenue bill, they may be compelled to take the responsibility for the consequences of that policy. For the very reason that it is impracticable, not to say impossible, to conclude the consideration of tariff proposals that, from the standpoint of their proponents, have merit, within a brief period, it would have been the part of wisdom to have treated the tariff question separately from the revenue issue.

I have great sympathy with the forceful argument made by the Senator from Nebraska. He has pointed out in language which can not be forgotten that the effect of the pending measure, in so far as it has been framed, is not only to impose additional tax burdens upon those who are not the beneficiaries of protection but it is calculated and designed to add materially to the cost of the necessities which they must buy and consume. That declaration of facts is indisputable, and for that reason those who seek to equalize the burdens carried by this bill find justification for the proposal submitted by the Senator from Nebraska. But, Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that any bill embracing a debenture provision for agriculture must encounter the peril of an Executive veto. That consideration does not intimidate me, because if the processes that are prevailing in the writing of this bill are to be continued, then a veto of its provisions may be justified in the interest of the American people, notwithstanding the imperative necessity for the balancing of the Budget.

Under the language of the amendment it will not be effective during this administration if we adopt it. Is there a Senator who hears me who believes that the Federal Farm Board as now constituted would exercise the discretion which it is proposed shall be vested in them to find the necessity and administer the provisions of the act? I know it may be said in answer that if the proposal be meritorious the responsibility should be placed on those who are charged with its administration for failure to make it effective. I have voted against the incorporation of any tariff item in this bill and against the tariff items which are in the bill in the belief that to pursue any other course invites, if it does not compel, a policy here which will result in confusion, combination, and detriment to the public interest.

On two occasions the measure proposed by the Senator from Nebraska received my support; and let me say now that before the Congress shall adjourn I favor taking up and considering the measure reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry containing, as I understand, among other things, the provision relating to debentures.

It is neither my purpose nor province to criticize the course taken by other Senators; but I have felt that there is a sane and practical policy which does not invite the acceptance by one Senator of a tariff proposal in order to secure the adoption of his own. I still feel that the manly, straightforward course to be pursued is promptly to write the revenue bill and obtain the revenue necessary to balance the Budget. In general terms, it is easy to make that declaration; in practical application there is great difficulty. We are reaching out into the upper regions and into the lower regions, searching everywhere for new sources of revenue; and there is not any plan that has been suggested under which the Congress can secure a billion dollars in addition to the funds now being received by the Government under our tax laws without imposing hardships and some measure of discrimination. No matter what we do, the result is not going to be popular. The Senator who votes against a measure to balance the Budget and maintain the national credit will invite condemnation; the Senator who supports any bill that will add $1,000,000,000 to the load the American people are now carrying in the form of taxation is certain to receive censure; but there is a duty to perform, an obligation to be observed, and I feel sure that every Senator here recognizes that obligation.

If we go forward in the way that we have been going, we will be considering tariff measures for several days to come; and when we have considered them, we will not be proud of our action; the country will not be proud of the course which the Senate has taken.

I think that it will be necessary to consider agricultural relief measures. I think it is best for the agricultural interests to consider them separately from this bill. In that view of the subject I shall reluctantly withhold my support from the pending amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I, of course, do not question the sincerity of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and I freely concede his right to follow such course in this matter as he thinks best; but there are certain things that ought to be called to the attention of the Senate and the country in connection with and, I think, in answer to the conclusions reached by the Senator from Arkansas.

I am aware of the force of his argument and the force of his leadership. I desire, however, to call attention to one or two of the things he said.

He said that those in charge of this legislation, if they permitted such things to go on and permitted things outside of a revenue bill to be put in this measure—tariff items and items such as the proposed and pending amendment—might be responsible even for a veto of the whole thing if they were all enacted into law, and that they would be responsible for other items of tariff schedules that would be offered as amendments to this bill.

I want the Senators to know that those who favor this debenture amendment are not responsible for the action of those who have had in charge this legislation. The chairman of the committee who sits before me, the Republican leader on this side who sat with him in the committee, and his associate who sits by his side when he is here, all voted for every one of these tariff amendments that have been proposed and put in this bill.

When the leaders of legislation, responsible for the legislation that comes from the committee, unite in voting for tariff items upon a bill that everybody admits ought to have no tariff items in it, are you going then to put the responsibility for the failure of this legislation upon the shoulders of those who are opposed to dragging tariff items in here? Are you going to put the responsibility upon us who are behind the motion now pending, and say that we are responsible, when we are coming in here in self-defense, when we are coming in here asking for this amendment in direct opposition to what we would like to ask for in this bill? Are we, who have fought the tariff amendments as they have been offered from time to time, and have been regularly defeated by the men who are behind this bill, responsible, as the Senator from Arkansas says, for this bill and this legislation?

We did not bring in this evil. It is not because of any action of ours that the Senate is in this dilemma and this illogical position. We fought it. We may be weak and lack ability when compared with the great leaders of the Finance Committee, but we did see this very predicament, and we pointed it out to the Senate and to the country. We were overridden by the so-called leaders responsible for this legislation. Now, when they have had their way, it seems to me it comes with poor grace for anybody to say to us, "Stop! Do not try to get relief for a large portion of our citizens, whose purchasing power for the very necessaries of life has been, to a great extent, taken away by these very amendments."

The farmer, for whose benefit this amendment is proposed, is going to be compelled, on account of the leadership we have had here and the combinations we have had here, to pay more for his gasoline, more for his coal, more for his lumber, than he would have had to pay if the advice of those who are behind this amendment had been followed by our leaders. Our voices were unheeded, our advice was spurned, and you put these amendments into this bill, overburdening the great agricultural West with an additional cost of living, making it impossible for an already overburdened farming community to obtain the very necessaries of life.

Do you suppose the men out on the great plains who will have to pay an additional price for coal are going to be satisfied when you place an embargo upon coal for the benefit of the coal men? They think just as much of their families and their firesides as do the men who produce the coal; and you are going to relieve one by adding to the burdens of the other. Do you expect the American people to be satisfied when you say to every farmer and every other person all over the great prairie West who wants to build a new house, a chicken coop, or a hogpen, and wants to do it at a time when he is toiling 16 hours a day to produce the food that we eat, that he will have to pay a higher price for his lumber? Does not he love his home? Does not he love his community? Is not he in the picture pointed out by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] when he told of the misery and the suffering of those in the lumber regions?

It is just as great a burden for him to see his children go only half-clad, to see his family suffer from the cold chills of winter, if he lives in a house out in Kansas or Nebraska as it is for the man who sits under the shade of a fir tree in the State of Washington. He has the same instincts, the same love of family, the same responsibilities as the man in the lumber region. Yet you are going to try to relieve one by adding to the burdens of the other, piling upon his already overburdened shoulders responsibility that he can not bear, while those who have immense incomes that they can not spend, and inheritances that they are going to control a thousand years after they are dead have so much money that they do not know what to do with it?

That is justice in America, is it? That is the reason for saying to those who want to continue the purchasing power of the farmers of the West, "You must not offer this amendment to this bill."

Is there something sacred about these four things that must be protected by a tariff to add to the distress of the already overburdened and downtrodden farmers? It takes as much fuel to keep a farmer in the West warm as it does a millionaire sitting with his feet on top of his mahogany desk. It takes practically as much clothes to clothe him and his children; yet you are adding to the burdens of those who are already overburdened, and you say, "You must not offer this amendment to a revenue bill."

If you are a coal magnate, if you own a lumber mill, it is all right to do it then. If you own oil wells, it is all right; but if you want to do something for downtrodden agriculture, it is all wrong.

Go on with this combination, Mr. President. Drive on your steam roller. There will come a time when you yourselves will not be able to buy the fuel to keep it running. You can push it over the forms of farmers and laboring men, from whom you have taken away their purchasing power for the necessaries of life, but eventually you will have nothing left of your own. Destroy agriculture and you have ruined our country. Add much more to the burdens of those who toil day and night, and then find a financial loss at the end of the season, and it will not be long before the man in the skyscraper, living in luxury, will realize that the foundation stone of all happiness and of all prosperity has been taken out from the building, and the entire edifice will come crumbling, falling down upon those who do not expect it now.

Nobody denies the justice of this amendment. In this debate there has been no voice that said it was not fair. No one has said it would not work, but, "You are not in the oil business. You are not in the coal business. You are not in the lumber business. Hence you must stand back and let us fix up this bill just to suit ourselves. You have no rights." You say to the magnates who are living in luxury, "You have these farmers down. You have your feet upon their throats, and we are going to see that you are allowed to keep them there." Then, in the political contest, you go to the farmer and you say, "Luxury and monopoly and trusts and combinations have their feet upon your neck. We will see to it that they go no further"; and that is the remedy that you offer to us!

That is the remedy which was promised us in the name of justice. You say to us now, "We promised in the campaign, in the words of Herbert Hoover, that if we were successful we would put the farmer upon an equality with the manufacturer; that we would give the farmer the benefit of the protective tariff." Here is your opportunity to make good your promise.

Are we going to be afraid because we are afraid of a presidential veto? This amendment, as a matter of fact, enables Herbert Hoover to carry out one of the pledges he made to American agriculture. He has not carried it out yet. This will give him an opportunity to do so. If he loses the opportunity and does not want to embrace it, it is for him to consider. I do not care to take up his duties or his responsibilities now. The responsibility at this moment is upon us, and we can not shift it. Yet there is no doubt that there are quite a number of votes in this Chamber which are going to be cast against this amendment simply to carry out the wishes of the man in the White House. If he wants to kill this legislation, let him kill it like a man, openly and aboveboard, and not through the operation of the political machinery by which he pulls the strings upon his servants and his followers in the United States Senate.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas said he wanted to consider this legislation in a separate bill. So do I. So have all of us. But we have always been blocked one way or the other by the political power and the political machine, and by the combinations of wealth and monopoly operating through those political elements.

This amendment was offered to the agricultural marketing act in practically the same form in which it appears here. It was agreed to in the Senate. It went to conference and was defeated in conference, mainly through the power and influence of the White House. It was said then, "This is not the place for this measure. It really belongs on a tariff bill." So it was defeated and thrown over the fence. But after a while the tariff bill came along, and we offered it again as an amendment to the tariff bill. It was said then, "It is not a tariff measure at all," just the reverse of what had been said before, "and has no business on a tariff bill." But a majority of the Senate said it did, and they put it in the tariff bill and in the exact terms in which it stands before us to-day.

We know what happened. We know the objection that was made by the President publicly, and undoubtedly in many and many a private conversation with Members of the House and Members of the Senate. We know the strings that were pulled; and again it went out.

Now comes this tax bill, the only opportunity we have had since to offer this measure, and we have had no desire to offer it as an amendment on this bill, because we have wanted to act in cooperation with the administration forces. We want to help as best we can to pass a revenue bill. But in that situation comes the chairman of the Finance Committee and the other leaders, administration followers, and put these four tariff items into the bill. They never could have gotten through any one of them, and everybody knows it, except by putting in the four. They made them sacred, and one is an enemy to his country if he dares suggest that there is any other product on earth that should be protected by a tariff in this bill except those four, selected by the leaders, and by those who were responsible for the particular bill now pending.

We have said from the very beginning that we wanted to cooperate, that we did not want to delay, that we wanted to make this a revenue bill. We tried our best to do it, but we are defeated by this combination, partially Democrats and partially Republicans, Democrats who ordinarily would claim to be low-tariff people voting for an embargo, Republicans over here in combination with them voting for tariffs which reach the very dome of heaven—embargoes—tariffs run wild and mad. They say, in effect, "We want to build a tariff wall around this country that can not be penetrated by anybody. We want to make it possible for combinations, monopolies, and trusts to form their illegal and their inhuman combinations this side of the tariff wall. So we put these four sacred items in this bill."

I understand, Mr. President, that these items have not only been placed in this bill, but, if the bill becomes law, they will be beyond the jurisdiction of the Tariff Commission. It will be impossible for us to go to the Tariff Commission and get a hearing upon them, as we ordinarily could as to any other tariff item, in order to reduce an exorbitant tariff. That will be impossible as to those items. These sacred four products will be placed above the control and the jurisdiction of the Tariff Commission itself. They will have to keep their unclean hands off these sacred items. They can not do anything to open up a discussion or a debate or an investigation in regard to these four items. They are sacred.

Then, in the sacredness of these four holy of holiest, comes the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate and says, "Do not put this amendment on this bill. It should not be on this bill." He says that, although we have already put on four tariff items.

The combination seems to be so complete that we can not succeed in levying a tariff on anything else, we can not succeed in getting any relief from the additional burdens put upon the farmer by the inclusion of these four items.

I state, Mr. President, that those responsible for this action may be rejoicing in what they believe to be the victory that has come to them on account of this unholy combination; they may be riding in the car of success, running their steam roller over anybody and everybody who dares to raise his weak voice in defense of any of his suffering people. But I predict that history will repeat itself. There has never been a monarch upon his throne supreme, happy in the power that he wielded, but some day went so far that he drove his victorious car over the precipice into ruin and destruction. And there is where we are going, that is where our country is going if it permits itself to be run and managed by combinations, unholy and wicked combinations, in the highest of all legislative halls.

Let them go on with their machine and drive it over the prostrate forms of their fellow citizens, but there will come a time when the very stones of Rome will cry out against them, the very pavements in the streets will some day rise up and strike them in the face.

They can not continue this unjust discrimination against our fellow citizens, they can not continue permanently to hold down the farmers of America in subjection, in cruel human slavery, in economic depression. There will come a time when their Juggernaut will itself be capsized by the force of its own power.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, representing in part a State which can not, in my judgment, get any assistance from the tariff provisions already written into the pending bill but, on the other hand, will be required to make a considerable contribution on account of the protection afforded the four industries which have so well been cared for—at least, an attempt has been made to care for them—I am strongly convinced that agriculture is deserving of a measure of relief in this bill.

While I am not responsible for the situation, a majority of the Senators have not hesitated to vote to impose tariffs in this measure which, if they operate as intended, these tariffs will cost the agricultural interests of this country millions upon millions of dollars. Yet, when a proposal is made here that the farmers shall in a measure be reimbursed for the contribution and the tribute which you intend to take from them in the interest of the oil people of the country, in the interest of the copper people of the country, in the interest of the coal people of the country, and in the interest of the lumber industry, some say, "Oh, we will wait until a more convenient day to do anything for agriculture."

I want to commend and thank the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] for bringing this question before the Senate. I think this is the proper time to make an adjustment and to let the agricultural interests of this country know that the Senate desires to do them justice, and that the Senate is not going to keep on passing over the matter of doing something for our farmers.

There is no class of people in America who are more stricken, and whose industry is more paralyzed, than that of the farmers of America. I am unable to see why those who were so zealous in behalf of the oil industry, so alert in behalf of the coal people of the country, and of the lumber and of the copper interests, should not have been equally as active before the committee in an effort to bring forth some measure of relief for agriculture at this time.

The hope was, on the part of many, at the time this bill was reported to the Senate, that Congress would adjourn within two and a half or three weeks. That was the intention, and the effort to drive the bill with undue haste through the Senate was largely actuated, I think, by a motive to have Congress adjourn in two and a half to three weeks. If that hope could be accomplished, it is very apparent that no relief measure in the interest of the farmer will be passed. With this bill once out of the way we will see extra speed applied again. It will be said that we must rush, that we must dispose of this measure and that measure, and that we must have an adjournment of Congress so that certain Senators can go to the political conventions. The fate of agriculture will be that it will again be waved aside. I am opposed to any such policy of indifference toward our farmers. I think this is a good opportunity to do something for our agricultural interests, and I want to congratulate the Senator from Nebraska for seizing the opportune moment. He has always been the friend of agriculture, and never more so than in this instance. He knows the modus operandi and procedure that usually prevail here, and he, of course, feels, as I do, that if we do not take this occasion to act for the promotion of the interests of agriculture the chances are that nothing will be accomplished in this direction at this session of Congress. It is doubly appropriate to place the legislation on this bill because the majority of the Senate have already dealt with the agricultural interests in making an imposition of taxation in the way of import duties or tariffs in this identical measure. The farmers have been made the victims of burdens imposed.

I do not favor taking away from the farmer millions and millions of dollars, if the plans operate as it is intended they shall operate, and then make no adjustment with him or for him. In all justice he is entitled to some contribution in return for that which it is expected to take away from him in the interest of oil, coal, copper, and lumber. Of course, everyone knows that it is the intention to get an increase in the prices of all such products. Some of them may deserve an increase, but when it is taken away from the farmer of the country, then the appropriate time has come to legislate and make an adjustment for him in this particular measure.

So far as the question of revenue is concerned, I do not believe anybody is going to be fooled or deceived with the idea that revenue for the Government was the prime and moving cause for the tariff provisions being placed in the pending measure. The inspiring and moving cause was to try to do something for these special and favored interests.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has correctly said what the object was, but the result is going to be that with these items in the bill, with the terrible tariff that is put upon them amounting in practically every case to an embargo, there will be less revenue under the rates put into the bill than there would be if they had been left out of the bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In all probability that is true. Of course, I think the object was merely to do something for the particular interests involved regardless of the cost to the remainder of the people. The question of balancing the Budget had nothing to do with it, nothing whatever. It was just a question of responding to the demands of the oil interests, the coal interests, the copper and lumber interests of the country, regardless of the cost to the people of the United States.

The majority wrote the tariff provisions into the bill which, if they operate as it is contemplated or hoped they will, while they are not going to raise any great increase in revenue are going to inflict an enormous additional burden upon the people of the country. Agriculture is one of the great interests of the country that will be affected. I repeat some adjustment, some atonement should be made to the farmer for what is imposed upon him in the very provisions of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. When I referred to less revenue I was thinking of the amendments offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] on aluminum. In my judgment, there will be no revenue from the tariffs levied on the articles in question, because they will be an embargo. When I spoke of less revenue under existing conditions I was thinking of the amendments relating to aluminum that were offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator.

Representing, as I do, a State which will not enjoy any of the beneficent benefits contemplated in behalf of copper and coal, gasoline and lubricating oil, a State that is going to be only an unwilling contributor on account of these impositions, I wish to say in behalf of that State that I desire to have some of the contribution my people will be forced to make because of these high tariffs, contributed to agriculture.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was hoping that some of us who are going to vote for the debenture would not have to admit that we had been caught with the wool in our teeth and were voting for it for that reason; in other words, that we had been taken in completely. If that is the case, it would seem to us, those of us who have stood by the tariff items, that we are petitioned now to take somebody else into the combination, that we have been caught with the swag and somebody else is demanding his share. Are we being censured for the vote we cast on the tariff items and now being petitioned to divide the moneybag with some one? That would seem to be the only explanation of some of the statements that have been made. But such is not the fact.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I did not mean it in that way. I meant that if those who had favored the tariff items wanted to make a proper adjustment, it would be very appropriate to have the amendment placed on this bill.

Mr. LONG. I think so.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Because the tariff items are intended to raise some revenue and they are certainly contemplated to assist in promoting and advancing the interests of the particular industries to which the tariffs apply.

Mr. LONG. I think so, from that standpoint, and I am going to vote for the debenture. However, I did not want one or two statements to go unchallenged, particularly the ones which were made about oil. When the oil matter first came up I made an effort to speak on the floor of the Senate on March 21, and I want to quote a short paragraph from the debate which took place at that time. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] addressed the Chair and I yielded to him, and he then said:

> A few moments ago the Senator from Louisiana referred to the tax on crude oil, and I think justified such a provision.

That was long ago, on the 21st day of March, when on the floor of the Senate the leader of our Democratic Party made that statement, and I deferred to him then. He said further:

> He also attacked the House for failure to incorporate a provision on the subject while seeking to impose a general sales tax. I know the Senator desires to be accurate in his statement, and I wondered if the Senator's attention had been called to pages 228 and 229 of the bill which is now before the body at the other end of the Capitol, the bill to provide revenue, etc., in which, on page 228, there is provision for a tax, as follows.

And the Senator from Arkansas then, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will remember and as the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] will remember, agreed to the proposition, as the RECORD shows, from which I am reading at page 6542. The statement of those who are undertaking to say that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has departed from any Democratic policy in this matter are sailing right into the face of the record that is here in black and white, that the matter was understood as coming from our Democratic House and was justified on the Democratic side of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Senators must know that the House imposed a duty upon crude oil and petroleum. They must know that the House imposed a duty of 10 cents a hundred on coal. The Senate did not enter into those two fields. The House itself did.

Mr. LONG. The facts are it was not any deception, that the two Houses understood it as concurred in the debate right on the floor of the Senate, that this was not anything that anybody was being slipped up on, because I have here in my hand what I have read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD showing that the leader on this side of the Chamber read to me those provisions and made the statement that the Senator from Louisiana had spoken of a tariff on oil and had justified the tariff on oil, and I feel that it is justified. So why have any more argument over this thing that ought to have been passed into history? The only difference is that we voted one-half cent when the item was reduced from 1 cent.

I want to correct the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] for one other remark, because the Senator from Florida is very accurate in his statements, as a usual rule, and means to be accurate in this instance. We can not decrease the revenues from oil because to-day we have no tariff on oil. This is not an increase in the tariff on oil. We have no tariff on oil at all. Maybe there is a tariff on Florida fruit too high. I think myself the Senator has one or two of them. Most of them are too low. Maybe he has a tariff on tomatoes too high. Maybe it ought to be lowered. Maybe they are too low and ought to be increased. Maybe there is a tariff on wool in Massachusetts that is too high. Maybe it ought to be lower.

But the Senator certainly ought not to say to the people of Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, and Kentucky, where we have no tariff whatever, that we should be left here with no tariff whatever on any of these products. When the Senator says it will not produce any more revenue than it is producing now, certainly he is reckoning without his host, because if we are not getting a dime of revenue from it now, certainly 21 cents a barrel is going to be 21 cents a barrel more than we are getting now if we import a barrel of crude oil. If we do not import more than one barrel, we will get 21 more cents than we are now getting on such product.

Mr. SMOOT. And if there is not a barrel imported, nobody is hurt.

Mr. LONG. That is just the point. There is nobody hurt.

I want to say one thing further. We are fencing ourselves into a very peculiar situation in continuing the argument. I know the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is a friend of labor and so is the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I believe I am a friend of labor. But this is the only tariff, gentlemen of the Senate, that has ever been asked for by the laboring men of America. You stood here and put every tariff on the backs of the people of the country that had been protested by the American laboring man, but this is the only tariff that has ever been voted by the United States Senate for which there was a demand and a request from the American Federation of Labor and the four railroad brotherhoods of the country. All the howl that has been raised at this time has been against the only tariff that has ever been demanded by the laboring people and by the farmers' unions of the country.

Why should we have this howl and this clap-trap when these people were not objecting to the other tariff items? The only objection in this long-continued protest that refused to yield is against the only tariff that has ever been voted on a product that had no tariff at all and is requested by the laboring and farming people of the country. It is the only one that has ever been requested by them, one that was introduced in the Democratic House and with the silent understanding if not open approval of the Democratic side in the Senate. I see no reason why we should keep on rehearsing that proposition in the Senate.

Now, as to the debenture, I do not think we are being treated exactly right. I am voting for the debenture. Many others of us want the debenture. I think, however, the case is weakened when we are placed under an attack for doing what was requested and what ought to have been done in the Senate. You are certainly not giving us very much grace to be with you in this kind of a proposition when it is put upon the basis that we did some things that ought not to have been done and now we should do something else as a result of having done something we ought not to have done. I do not believe the case is strengthened in that particular.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, in reference to my position upon the pending revenue measure I desire to say that I took the same attitude as that of the Senator from Nebraska relative to the incorporation in it of tariff items, believing that this should be a revenue measure rather than a tariff measure. So in voting upon the pending amendment my vote will not be because I am hostile to agricultural relief. Few States have greater agricultural interests than has Illinois, and I presume that none of the States are suffering more grievously than is Illinois. Having voted in an endeavor to keep the revenue measure as a revenue measure and having been defeated upon that, we now have a revenue measure and a partial tariff measure. I intend to be consistent.

The bill being bad now, in my judgment, because it is both a revenue measure and a partial tariff measure, I do not intend to make it a revenue measure, a tariff measure, and a farm-relief measure. I can not see that that would be helpful in the present vital situation. We have already had prohibition considered, and I fear that if we adopt the pending proposal we shall have a revenue measure, a partial tariff measure, a farm-relief measure, and before long a World Court measure and a League of Nations measure, and I do not know but what the birth-control measure will be added to it. So I intend to vote against the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to take a moment of the Senate's time to say that I intend to vote for the pending amendment. The Senate on two prior occasions adopted a similar amendment, which was defeated because of the stubbornness of the House of Representatives, influenced by the administration. In my view, this is the most important and most practical farm-relief measure that has as yet been proposed. I do not agree to the view that we will unnecessarily delay matters by adopting this amendment at the present time. As soon as this bill shall be out of the way, we shall have before the Senate measures called "relief measures" designed to give relief to industry, to banks, and to the railroads. I think it is just as important that we spend a little of our time endeavoring to rehabilitate the great wheat, cotton, and other agricultural pursuits of the Nation as to relieve the great organized industries. I therefore intend to vote for the amendment.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for just a moment. That committee has recently voted to report out a bill which embodies the equalization fee, the debenture provision, and the allotment plan, all of which are indorsed by the great farm organizations of America. It had been my intention to support that bill as a rider to the revenue bill. The Senator from Nebraska, however, is anxious to have a vote upon the debenture alone, and I am wondering if that amendment shall be defeated, or whether it is defeated or not, if we are going to have an opportunity to vote at this session of Congress upon the farm relief bill agreed to by the farm leaders? I should like to have the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon that question.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is true that the major farm organizations, after many years of disagreement, have come to an agreement with respect to a plan, as an amendment to the marketing act, which pools the three ideas, one of which is the debenture plan, another the so-called allotment plan, and the third the equalization-fee plan. The agreement reached by the farm leaders was expressed at a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry some time in April. Last Friday the committee met in executive session and unanimously voted to report the bill. The chairman of the committee was authorized to make the report. The report will be finished to-morrow. We have had so very much to do here on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere that since last Friday I have not had an opportunity to place the report in form. I can, however, assure the Senator from Idaho and other Senators that the report on the bill, embodying these three proposals as amendments to the agricultural marketing act, will be filed to-morrow in the Senate. The bill will then go to the calendar, and as chairman of the committee it is my purpose before the end of the present session to ask that a vote be had upon the bill, which embodies the plans, the purposes, and the ambitions of the three major agricultural organizations of the country.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I take the liberty of asking the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when he thinks the Senate will consider the farm relief bill?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, my judgment is not any better than and probably not equal to that of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. It is my hope, expressed on many occasions, that we may conclude our work here by the 11th day of June. I have dedicated what little efforts I have been able to make to that end, and between now and the 11th of June I think I shall find ample opportunity—and I shall seek the opportunity—to bring the measure before the Senate.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oregon. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, however, that there is just a week left of this month, and then we will be in June. I also call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we are to aid the farmer this year we must act promptly. If the amendment embodying the debenture feature shall be adopted, it will be possible to give the farmer the benefit of the debenture upon this year's crops.

What the farmer needs is immediate help. He needs it far more than does the copper industry; he needs it far more than does the oil industry; he needs it far more than does the coal industry or the lumber industry, because all these industries have enjoyed a marked degree of prosperity during the most of the past 10 years, while the farmer has been in the trough of depression during that entire period.

The prospect now is that if we do not act immediately in behalf of agriculture that there can be no hope for agriculture until another year. The farmer's crops are annual; they must be provided for in advance. A measure of this kind going into effect after, for instance, wheat is out of the way, or partially harvested, and in the hands of the middlemen, would prove a failure. The question before the Senate is: Do we intend to do anything for the farmer? If we do—there will be no alibi—we must act now.

It is possible under this amendment to give the farmer a subsidy of about $114,000,000 this year. If the Senate does not want to do that, the Senate will, in effect, say it has not the will to act.

I can not imagine the President vetoing this tax bill because this amendment is attached to it when the amendment places the discretion in the Farm Board as to whether the provisions of the amendment shall be applied or not. Even though the President should sign a bill including this amendment, he still would be in a position to prevent its application if he should see fit to do so. We ought not to intimate to the farmer that we sympathize with him, that we desire to do for him, and at the same time negate our words by refusing to act now when there is an opportunity to serve him.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I was one of those who voted for the debenture when it properly came before this body, and I have a very great desire and inclination to vote for it now, but I do not think it has any place upon a revenue bill. It is not a measure to raise revenue; it is a measure to take revenue out of the Public Treasury and hand it over to a worthy class. I voted for it before, notwithstanding my avowed opinion that it was uneconomic and a species of privilege, but I took the view that the American farmer was the unhappy victim of an uneconomic tariff system and that the debenture would afford him the only assurance of a measurable return in compensation for the tribute he was compelled by the tariff system to pay to the manufacturers of the country.

I have resisted every appeal made to me from my own State to put onto this revenue bill tariff protection for Virginia industries. Within the hour I have been called out of the Senate Chamber and appealed to to support certain proposed tariff riders to this bill in which industries in my State are vitally interested, but I have resisted all such appeals with the statement that they have no place upon this revenue bill.

I have no reproach for any Member of either House of Congress who stands in his place when we are considering tariff proposals and maintains in equity and in sound theory the right of his State and of the industries of his State to be accorded equal consideration to that accorded the industries of other States. That, however, is not the case here, and I do not propose by my vote to contribute to the political tragedy that was enacted in this Chamber last week. Therefore, with much regret, I shall be compelled to change my attitude on the debenture, and to vote against the proposal to embody it in the pending revenue measure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in what I am about to say; but I have been sitting here to-day, taking no part in the debate, listening to this tariff argument, and if I have heard anything to-day about raising revenue I have heard it in the cloakrooms and in the corridors, and not on the floor of the Senate.

A great deal has been said about the responsibility for putting these tariff measures in this revenue bill. Some have claimed that the House is responsible, some have claimed that the Senate is responsible, and some have claimed that everybody is responsible. It strikes me that the real responsibility for having these tariff items voted in the bill at this time is partly ours and partly that of the House; but in this period of great national emergency the real responsibility is with the White House, for the following reasons:

Everyone knows that the chairman of the Finance Committee, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], would be delighted to drop these tariff measures if the White House would so much as indicate that it was inadvisable to have them in this bill at this time. Everybody knows that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] would be glad to goose-step if Mr. Hoover were to request him so to do. But, Mr. President, let me point out that four or five days ago Senators on the other side of the aisle sent word to the White House that it was inadvisable to incorporate these tariff items in this revenue bill at this time, and the President even went so far as to write out a statement urging that the tariff items be taken out of the revenue bill; but did he send that statement? Oh, no! Before the statement could leave the White House other Senators had heard of it, and they went down and told the President that they wanted these items in the bill, and pictured the situation, saying that it would be inadvisable to take these items out of the bill now; that it would ruin their chances of reelection, forsooth, if these things were extracted from this precious revenue measure; and the President, with the usual courage and forthrightness which has characterized his efforts from the beginning to the end, said, "Well, then, I will do nothing whatsoever about it."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator has referred to me in relation to these items. I desire to say that the President of the United States has never said a word to me about the items.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; but if he did say a word to the Senator from Utah, he would jump through a hoop in a minute, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah does not know any such thing. I have never yet had a President of the United States dictate to me how I should vote; and if any President of the United States should try to do so, and I was opposed to it, I would plainly tell him so. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I realize that. Why, if the President of the United States, with his press clippings on his desk every day for him to peruse, knowing that these items were being considered, knowing that they would bring on a tariff debate, knowing that the country wanted this bill passed, had sent word down to the Senator from Utah that he wanted these items taken out of the bill, that he insisted upon it, I know that the Senator is too good a party man not to have gone along with the presidential request; and every other Member of this body knows it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Maryland to announce what I would do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not reflecting on the Senator from Utah. I am commending him for his party loyalty because I realize that protection has to come ahead of revenue, and that has been the Senator's stand from beginning to end.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question in my mind but that the Senator from Maryland knows very well that I am a protectionist. I have been all my life so far. I expect to be as long as I live, as long as the American standard of living is as it is, and the standards of living in foreign countries are as they are.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; the standard of living in America to-day is 10,000,000 people living on charity. If that is any standard to hold up with pride, the Senator is entitled to all the credit he can get out of it.

I rose to say, however, that the responsibility for this measure is with the White House. The President is the leader of the whole Nation—not a Democrat, not a Republican, but in control of this country's interests—and if he were the kind of President that he ought to be, he would send word down here to take these controversial matters out of this revenue bill and send it on its way. But he is silent, because, forsooth, he first writes a message, and then he withdraws his message; he talks to two Senators and says this, and he talks to two more Senators and says that. That is the type of leadership we have in this country! My God, save the Republic!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator expressing any opinion of the President that he desires and so forcefully expresses. I can not agree with him.

Mr. TYDINGS. The President could send a message to this Congress. He could tell the ex-service men not to come here in the hour of their country's need and ask for an additional gift from the Treasury. Nobody criticized him for that; but he could not tell these four large interests that have come here to take $486,000,000 a year out of the consumers' pockets to lay off in the hour of our country's need, and stand aside, and let their commodities come up with all other commodities.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I only get about halfway through a statement, and the Senator then speaks louder than I can, and I am unable to finish.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can not hear the Senator, and I try to speak loud enough so that at least he can hear me.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt but that the Senator from Maryland can be heard outside of the Chamber.

Mr. TYDINGS. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah must stand shoulder to shoulder under this responsibility.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not trying to shirk responsibility.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I wanted to hear the Senator say. I wanted to hear the Republican chairman of the Finance Committee, the majority chairman, say, "I am responsible for inserting these tariff measures in this revenue bill."

Mr. SMOOT. But I am not responsible for that.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has just said that he was.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I said——

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator just said that he was responsible.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that I would take the responsibility for my vote and for my action.

Mr. TYDINGS. I refuse to yield, Mr. President. The Senator just said he was responsible, and he voted to put them in the bill; and he stands under that responsibility more than any other man because, forsooth, he is the chairman of the committee; and if he had voted against them, no one of those items would have been in the bill. Every member of the Senator's party voted to put them in except the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Let the Senator take his blame along with his credit, and not take his credit without his blame. In the hour of the country's peril, when the Budget should have been balanced, when everybody should have sacrificed every sectional interest, he did not mind saying, "That goes for everybody in the country except the oil interest and the copper interest and the lumber interest and the coal interest. You gentlemen come up. You sit at the speakers' table. You eat off the painted china plates, but we will let the rest of America eat off the wooden sandwich plates. We want copper and coal and lumber and oil to have special treatment."

The Senator knows that if the President were to say to him this night, "Senator SMOOT, I ask you for the country's welfare to take these controversial matters out of this bill and pass a revenue bill, not a tariff bill," the Senator would be patriotic enough and party man enough to respond to the slightest invitation of that kind from the President. But has the President said anything? He can talk at other times. He can drive the ex-service men from the Capitol; but if he scorned the lobby which wrote these measures into this bill, why does he not scorn the results of the lobby's work? What good does it do to scorn the lobby by generalities, and approve by silence the results of the lobby's work?

We never had a more equivocation, more evasion, and less courage from any President in my lifetime than under the existing administration. I repeat now the question which I have asked for four years: Is there any man beneath God's sun who can tell me where Herbert Hoover stands on the prohibition question? If so, let him stand up and tell me. Is there anyone?

You do not mean to tell me that the leader of this country, with everybody under the sun having an opinion upon this question, has no opinion. What can you think of a man who will let two of his Cabinet officers go all over the country indicating that he is going to be for a change in prohibition later on, and have a member of his semiofficial family, a member of this Government, say he is not going to be for any change, and be put in that equivocal position?

I am sick of this hypocrisy, sick of this sham, sick of the politics, sick of the evasion, sick of the equivocation, sick of the lack of courage, while all the country is suffering in a quagmire of misery, in a slough of despond, in a bog of hopelessness; and all we get is silence. When the whole Nation asks that this tax bill be passed, that the Budget be balanced, that enough money be brought into the Treasury to pay the Government's debts, the leader of the Nation is content to sit up in his swivel chair and let his own party jam tariffs into this bill, which are pure protective measures, embargoes, and nothing else.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I answer something, perchance by way of consoling the situation?

The eminent Senator from Maryland addresses an interrogatory as to why members of the President's Cabinet go out and indicate that the President is now for changing prohibition, and will occupy a position against it. I will answer the Senator that it seems, that being so, that the President is showing a rare sagacity in providing very early to liquidate a frozen political asset. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Some one may say, "The speech of the Senator from Maryland is cheap. It is partisan. It is Democratic. It is not patriotic."

Let me point out, Mr. President, that there has not been one measure which your leader has asked to have passed in this body which has not had my support. I voted for his moratorium, not because I thought it wise but I thought we were in a period of great emergency, and if he considered the emergency severe enough to ask for my detached approval I would give it to him for a year. I have supported them all; and all I have seen and all I have had to support is a lot of opiates shot into the arm of a sick man who is crying out for medicine which will cure.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, the Glass-Steagall banking bill, the other propositions that have been offered, none of them go to the heart of the matter. They are all things to check the toboggan going down hill. There is no courage, no real solution; and when the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] stood up on the floor the other day and advocated some relief measures, he was called to the White House, because it looked as though the Democrats might have a good plan which Mr. Hoover had better grab first. Then the plan was embraced; it became the Robinson-Hoover plan; and two days after that Mr. Hoover repudiated the plan that he embraced, and said he was not for that sort of a plan.

The President can berate Congress all he wants to. I have been silent these many months under the urge to say what I have said this afternoon. I defy anybody in this Republic to tell me where the President stands on four or five of the largest questions now before the people. If you have that type of leadership in the White House, what do you expect of a Congress that is supposed to follow, at least in some measure, presidential recommendations whenever those recommendations come down here?

I remember all too well the campaign of four years ago. We were told, "Put the great engineer in the White House, and the farm problem will be solved." What a lurid chapter of this country's history the solution of the farm problem has been. Five hundred million dollars poured down a rat hole; agriculture more prostrate than it ever has been; the White House bankrupt of any solution; and Senators on both sides of the aisle advocating the abolition of the board which was created in such a burst of enthusiasm and patriotism.

What is the President's farm plan now? Balancing the Budget will cure this, balancing the Budget will cure the loss of our world trade, balancing the Budget will cure the prohibition imbroglio.

What I rose particularly to say was that when a man is caught with the goods in his hands, the fact that he may have an accomplice does not excuse him, and while that illustration is rather crude, I say to the senior Senator from Utah that he is caught with the vote to put these tariff items in the bill, and with one exception every member of his party on the Finance Committee voted to put them in the bill. Without the vote of every one of that party, except the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], they would not be in the bill. More than that, if the President of the United States should ask the Senator from Utah to take them out of the bill as being improper in a revenue measure, or for any other reason, I know the Senator better than he knows himself if he says he would not be the first to try to get them out of the bill.

The soldier should not come here and ask for any special "hand-out." It is not patriotic. The Senator from Utah said so, and the Senator from Pennsylvania said so. But it is patriotic for these 20 large oil companies to come here and take $486,000,000 a year out of the consumers' pockets. We do not hear any protest against that, do we?

There must not be any debenture in this bill. It ought to be in a separate bill. It is all right to put a protective tariff measure in a revenue raising bill, but we should not put a farm measure in a revenue raising bill because the farmers have no place here now. The places are reserved. All the seats are purchased for the 20 large oil companies who are to get a tribute of $486,000,000 out of the pockets of the American public. It is not to go into the Treasury; ah, no. The Senator from Utah, over his own signature, said the tax would raise only $5,000,000 in the way of revenue; but the $486,000,000 will go into the pockets of the large oil companies of this country.

"You farmers have no right here whatsoever. This is not the place for you to have your day in court. We are going to give you that 18 months from now when the remaining few of you who have a few dollars left will have likewise gone into bankruptcy, and therefore that question will solve itself."

We all know what is going to happen at the convention of the majority party which is soon to be held. We are going to have a referendum on the liquor question. The men who wield the lead pencils are drawing the plank up now for that, and how to word that referendum so as to hold all of the "wets" and all the "drys" possible presents a very serious problem. Every comma is measured, every word is gone over repeatedly, phrases are interchanged, present-tense verbs become past-tense verbs if it will make it a little easier. The idea is to be both wet and dry, to be all things to all people, and therefore to fool both sides again.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, can the Senator give us any authoritative statement as to what the Democratic plank will be on that question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I can. The Democratic candidate will not rely on platform vagueness. He will state on the stump that he is opposed to prohibition, and favors the return of the control of that question to the States, where the people know best how to solve the problem.

Mr. GLENN. I asked about the plank. What is the plank going to be?

Mr. TYDINGS. It will be that in effect. What will the Republican plank be? Now, that I have been good enough to answer the Senator's question, will he be good enough to answer mine, and tell me what the Republican plank will be?

Mr. GLENN. I do not know what the plank of either party on that question will be.

Mr. TYDINGS. At least I know a little about my own party's platform, and I believe I know a great deal more than the Senator from Illinois knows about his party's platform, because by the "grape vine" I am advised that we are agreed on a referendum or revision. They have thrown out the word "revision," because they used that in connection with the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, and that has brought so much suffering on the country that the word "referendum" is to be substituted, I understand, for "revision" of the eighteenth amendment.

What a pity it is. In a few days we are to vote to impose a new burden on the American people of a billion two hundred million dollars in annual taxes, a sum of money equivalent to $10 for every man, woman, and child in the country, or $40 a family a year. Yet our great leader of the Nation, who tells the Congress when it is bad just what it ought to do, who is the strong man who stands out in this period of equivocation, who knows the answer to this question but will not tell it to anybody because, forsooth, it might be criticized—he has no remedy at all. Yet, knowing this tremendous financial burden is coming down upon the backs and shoulders of the American people, he waits until Congress has practically adjourned to put into motion the machinery which would immediately afford the Government $500,000,000 annually and make just that much less of this tax necessary.

I have already spoken longer than I had intended to. I just want to say this, that I lay the responsibility upon the doorstep of the President, because he has remained silent in the face of the fact that his whole party, as represented on the Finance Committee, with the exception of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], on all of the votes, and one or two other Senators, perhaps, on some individual votes, voted to put these tariff items in the bill, and this whole week of debate could have been saved if he had not first written his message and then decided not to write it, and conferred with two Senators who were against the tariff first, and then two who were for it and decided he would not do anything and let a whole week of time go by because he might antagonize some of the elements on the other side of the aisle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the amendment to the amendment being on page 4 of the amendment, line 5, to strike out "one-half" before the words "rate of duty," so as to make the debenture rate on any agricultural commodity the rate of duty in effect at such time; and in line 8, before the words "cents," to strike out "2" and insert "4," so as to read, "the cotton debenture rate thereon shall be 4 cents per pound."

The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceed to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote upon this question, in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I do not know how he would vote if present and voting. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I do not know what his position would be on this amendment to the amendment. Were I privileged to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who is ill. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote on this amendment, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CUTTING. I have a pair for the evening with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the special pair of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—16

Blaine	Frazier	Norbeck	Shipstead
Brookhart	Hawes	Nye	Thomas, Idaho
Bulow	Howell	Schall	Thomas, Okla.
Costigan	Long	Sheppard	Wheeler

NAYS—64

Ashurst	Connally	Gore	Logan
Bailey	Coolidge	Hale	McGill
Bankhead	Copeland	Harrison	McNary
Barbour	Couzens	Hatfield	Moses
Barkley	Dale	Hayden	Neely
Bingham	Davis	Hebert	Norris
Borah	Dickinson	Hull	Oddie

NOT VOTING—16

Austin	Cutting	Lewis	Robinson, Ind.
Black	Fletcher	McKellar	Stephens
Byrnes	Hastings	Metcalf	Swanson
Caraway	Jones	Morrison	Waterman

So, Mr. FRAZIER's amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. NORRIS was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CUTTING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. If the junior Senator from Mississippi were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair as on the last roll call, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who is ill. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the special pair of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—33

Barkley	Costigan	Long	Smith
Blaine	Dill	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Frazier	Neely	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	George	Norbeck	Trammell
Brookhart	Hawes	Norris	Walsh, Mont.

So the amendment proposed by Mr. NORRIS was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I reluctantly voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. If the amendment had been presented as an independent proposition and not as a part of the tax bill before us, it would have commanded my support. The depressed condition of agriculture may not be ignored and before Congress adjourns relief measures should be enacted into law. The debenture plan may not be comprehensive enough; it may be defective; but it is infinitely better than the farm-relief measure which Mr. Hoover imposed upon the country and which has failed to meet the needs of the farmers.

Several years ago when the debenture plan was before the Senate, and it was textually the same as the amendment just offered by the Senator from Nebraska, I voted for it, believing that it would be of some benefit to the agriculturists of our country. I am advised that before Congress adjourns a number of agricultural bills will be submitted for the consideration of the Senate, and ample opportunity will then be afforded to discuss the merits or demerits of the debenture plan and to adopt or reject the same. As stated, we are now considering a tax measure, and, in my opinion, the question involved in the amendment is not germane to it and should not be incorporated in the tax bill. It is important that this revenue measure be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment. Delay should be avoided. Under the circumstances and in view of the fact that farm-relief measures will be considered before we adjourn, I felt constrained to vote against the Senator's amendment, although, as stated, I have heretofore supported it; and if nothing better is offered I shall again give it my support.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have received from the Legislative Commission from the Philippines a communication urging the early consideration and passage of Philippine legislation now before us. In the nature of a petition I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The communication is as follows:

LEGISLATIVE COMMISSION FROM THE PHILIPPINES,
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1932.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As the session of the Congress draws to a close, we take the liberty, on behalf of the people of the Philippine Islands, to appeal once more to the United States Senate, through you, for early and favorable action with respect to the Philippine bills now pending in the Senate, before adjournment.

The Philippine problem has been discussed, examined, and investigated by the United States Congress almost continuously during the last 15 years, and extensive hearings on the pending bills have been conducted this year by the House and Senate committees. It would seem, therefore, that no great length of time will be needed for its disposal. The Hare bill passed the House by a practically unanimous vote, and the Hawes-Cutting bill, favorably reported last March by your committee, has, in its underlying features, so far as we can judge, the support of a large majority of the Senate. The differences between the Hare bill and the Hawes-Cutting bill concern matters of detail which can be readily adjusted.

We are not unaware that the Senate is confronted with economic and social problems of transcendental importance to the United States, urgently requiring action. However, the people of the Philippine Islands trust that when these problems shall have been acted upon the Senate will consider and pass the pending Philippine legislation.

We are urging action at this time, confident that the Senate realizes the importance of this legislation for the Philippine Islands, not only because it will definitely determine its future political status but also because it will settle other vexatious questions concerning immigration and the tariff which have arisen in the course of American-Philippine relations. It is apparent that to permit the Philippine measures now before the Senate to go without action will increase the uncertainty which already characterizes the Philippine situation. This indecisiveness is very harmful, not only to the political development of the islands but also to business interests there. Until the question of independence and trade relations with the United States is defined and adjusted stable economic conditions can not exist in the Philippines, no new capital will risk investment there, and real economic progress is hardly possible.

Believing that the Members of the Senate will appreciate the reasons which constrain us to request the consideration and passage of the Philippine legislation at this session, we beg to remain,

Yours respectfully,
For the Philippine Commission:

S. OSMENA,
Acting President of the Philippine Senate.
MANUEL ROXAS,
Speaker of the Philippine House of Representatives.

DEPRESSION AND LEGISLATIVE RELIEF

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an admirable address delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] during the national radio forum and broadcast over the National Broadcasting Co. network on last evening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

I appreciate this opportunity through the courtesy of the Washington Star and the National Broadcasting Co. to briefly outline present emergency laws enacted for relief from depression and the proposals for future legislation. It will not take long to discuss existing legislation, as only a few bills have been enacted looking to such relief.

I do not wish to be understood as speaking in a critical vein. This depression is unique in our history. Our other periodical depressions have been more or less local in their nature, limited to countries or sections, and due to such definite causes that they could be easily understood and expeditiously remedied. This astounding and devastating depression is world-wide in its scope and effect. Strange to say, our country, the richest in gold, natural resources, intelligence, industry, and efficiency, is probably the greatest sufferer.

While this depression has buried us with the speed of an avalanche, it has come upon us with the silence and surprise of death. Few of the great minds of the world anticipated it. But a little over two years ago the world was enjoying the greatest prosperity and our country was leading in this great advance. To-day our factories are operating upon from 20 to 30 per cent of their normal capacity. The products of our farms and our mines are generally selling below the cost of production. Our export trade has almost reached the vanishing point, surpluses have piled up, and our domestic market has decreased approximately 40 per cent. From eight to ten millions of industrious, able, intelligent, and willing men and women are unemployed, walking the streets of our cities and the roads of our country, seeking labor from which to earn sufficient to feed and clothe themselves and their families.

It is conclusively evident that we are faced with the gravest emergency in our history. We met the emergency of the World War fearlessly and unselfishly. We taxed ourselves without limit and we did those things that had to be done without complaint. We can and should do the same things now.

Is there any statesman or economist who dares assert that two and one-half years ago he visualized this appalling condition? If so, I do not know of him. On the contrary, the citizens of this country and their representatives in government were lulled into dormancy and inaction through the mistaken optimistic predictions of those in high authority in government, industry, and finance. There were some, however, who partially visualized the impending disaster.

Some warnings were issued, but they were submerged and obscured in the great wave of optimistic declarations. The American Federation of Labor persistently called attention to the steady increase in unemployment. These warnings, however, were neutralized by controversial statements from the Department of Labor. Captains of industry continued, through the months of depression, to predict that the turning point would soon be reached. It was these things that excuse inaction by Congress for so long a time.

There were statesmen, however, who visualized the trend toward depression. As far back as February 15, 1928, Senator WAGNER, of New York, introduced in the Seventieth Congress Senate Resolution 147, to investigate the extent of unemployment in the United States and to provide methods for collecting statistics thereof. Even then unemployment had commenced, although the stock market was still booming.

Again, on April 20, 1928, Senator WAGNER introduced Senate bill 4157, for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and to regulate the expenditure of moneys to be appropriated for such purposes. Again Senator WAGNER, on May 1, 1928, introduceed Senate bill 4307, to provide for the emergency construction of certain public works for the relief of unemployment during the periods of business depression. All of these measures, except the last, that I have named met such overpowering opposition that it was impossible to enact them.

However, in the Seventy-first Congress Senator WAGNER was successful in passing through Congress Senate bill 5776 entitled "An act to provide for the advance planning and regulated construction of public works, for the stabilization of industry, and for aiding in the prevention of unemployment during periods of business depression." This act is known as the employment stabilization act of 1931. It was approved and became a law on February 10, 1931. This was the first relief act to become a law.

At the beginning of this session of Congress Senator COSTIGAN, of Colorado, introduced a bill calling for an appropriation of $375,000,000 to be expended by the Federal Government in aid of the destitute throughout the United States. The bill was subsequently known as the Costigan-La Follette bill. Some of the friends of the proposed legislation objected to it being administered by a Federal bureau. Without the support of these friends there were not sufficient votes to pass the bill. A substitute was therefore offered by Senators BULKLEY, WALSH, and WAGNER carrying all of the original provisions of the Costigan-La Follette bill, but transferring the administration of the act to the States and local charity institutions. Whilst a majority of the Senate favored the purpose of the act, their forces were divided, and the opposition Senators defeated both the substitute and the Costigan-La Follette bill.

A compromise bill was then drafted which received the approval of the Committee on Manufactures, of which Senator LA FOLLETTE is chairman, and was reported to the Senate. This bill carries an appropriation of $375,000,000 for the relief of the destitute, and $375,000,000 for Federal-aid road work. It also provides that part of such money may be used in cities, towns, and other municipalities in the construction of streets, alleys, bridges, and aqueducts. No action has been taken on this bill because Congress has had all of its time taken up with revenue, banking, and appropriation bills.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was proposed by the President. The corporation was to be organized and function along the lines of the old War Finance Corporation, but with larger and broader authority. This was in no sense a partisan measure. It was passed practically unanimously by Congress. By reason of its limited authority and its administration it has been used chiefly to aid in sustaining the credit of banks and railroad corporations. Its authority must be greatly enlarged if it is to serve the purpose of stimulating industry generally and employment throughout the country.

The Glass-Steagall Banking Act was largely the conception of its sponsors. It was intended to increase the securities in banks that might be utilized through rediscount with the Federal reserve banks for the issuance of additional currency. The banks, at the time of the passage of the act, according to Senator GLASS, even then had approximately $5,000,000,000 in securities eligible for such rediscount. The banks seemed to fear to use these securities and so Senator GLASS proposed that certain bonds held by the banks might also be added to the eligible securities and so they were. The act has not served the high purpose intended by its authors and by Congress. The banks have failed and refused to avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining and circulating the additional currency. This is due to fear. They fear to borrow additional currency from the Federal reserve banks and lend it to industry because most industry is suffering a deficit rather than earning a profit. Industry will not borrow money when it can not make a profit on such money above the interest that it pays for it.

The President, in his public statement on May 13th, said that "There is no dearth of capital, and on the other hand there is a real demand for capital for productive purposes that have been held in abeyance."

Our citizens wonder why, in such case, do the banks require Government aid; why the banks do not lend money to such industries. The country was told that the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass-Steagall Banking Act would restore confidence. These acts have evidently failed to restore confidence, for we still hear the cry that we must restore confidence. According to the President, the banks have ample capital and there are safe industries that seek this capital.

It is therefore difficult to understand why there should be a lack of confidence on the part of the banks. It is not so difficult, however, to understand why there is a lack of confidence on the part of the unemployed, the farmer whose product sells for less than it costs to produce it, and the manufacturer who can find but few to purchase his goods.

In view of the foregoing statement of the President, many believe that the doubt as to the economic stability of our Government, and the lack of confidence in the safety of our Government securities, is due in a large measure to the fear and hysteria of capital and its constant, dire predictions of disaster.

There is no investment in the world as safe as the bonds and securities of our Government, and our people should know that. It is the patriotic duty of those controlling the enormous capital of this country to reassert their confidence in our Government and its ability to finance the development of Federal projects and to pay all obligations that it may incur.

So the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass-Steagall banking act, while accomplishing some good, have in a sense been failures. Commodity prices have continued to fall and unemployment to increase.

Senator ROBINSON, the Democratic leader of the Senate, on May 11, in an address in the United States Senate, set forth a program for relief. It embraced the enactment of the last Wagner relief bill, which I have described, and also advances by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in aid of what he termed self-liquidating projects such as bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, and similar projects devoted to public use when such projects, through tolls, rents, lease, or royalties, will insure the return of the money advanced. The President immediately called Senator ROBINSON into conference. On May 13 the President gave out a statement on the subject. He approved of adding to the authority and power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of aiding through loans "economically sound and self-supporting projects of a constructive replacement character." His statement was construed to include such self-liquidating projects as Senator ROBINSON designated in his speech. The President also approved of advances by the Federal Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to the States of from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000, upon approved security, for the purpose of aiding in the relief of the destitute. He opposed further Federal aid for what he termed "unproductive public works."

A subcommittee of the Democratic policy and steering committees, composed of Senators WAGNER, WALSH, PITTMAN, BULKLEY, and ROBINSON, was appointed to draft a bill for the relief of industry, agriculture, and labor. This committee, on May 21, issued a statement setting forth the proposed program of legislation. The program provides for $300,000,000 to be advanced to the States in proportion to population, for the relief of destitution, upon demand of the governor seeking such relief and his certification that it is needed, such advances to be deducted from future grants to the State under the Federal aid highway act. This is in accord with the Wagner bill, approved by the Committee on Manufactures and now on the calendar of the Senate.

Additional authority is to be granted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation so that it may advance not to exceed $1,500,000,000 for the following purposes:

"(a) Construction of revenue-producing projects initiated by States, municipalities, and public corporations.

"(b) Housing and slum clearance projects undertaken by limited-dividend corporations.

"(c) Construction by private corporations of self-liquidating bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, and similar projects devoted to the public use. Under this proposal no loans shall be made to any financial institution, corporation, railroad, or other association or organization of a class to which loans may be made now under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

"(d) Forty million dollars to facilitate the financing of agricultural exports."

Government works are also taken care of in the program. The report says:

"Provision to be made for construction of $500,000,000 worth of previously authorized Federal works and for the financing of such construction by means of a 25-year bond issue and sinking fund, the bonds to be issued as needed to pay for the works as they progress.

"The Federal projects to be selected must stand these specific tests:

"(a) They have heretofore been investigated and authorized by Congress with the approval of the President.

"(b) The necessary plans for their construction are in readiness or in preparation.

"(c) All are needed for the proper conduct of the Government business.

"Most of the works can be commenced at once. All of the works can be put under way within a few months. All have been carefully chosen with a view to giving maximum employment."

There are some items in the Budget and carried in the current appropriation bills that are in the nature of capital investments. For instance, for the Boulder Canyon project there is carried in the Interior Department appropriation bill $6,000,000. The department informs us that this amount will have to be increased by $11,000,000 in the forthcoming deficiency appropriation bill. This project should not be included in the current Government expenditures. It is a self-liquidating project. The future hydroelectric power to be generated has all been sold in advance to solvent contractees for a sufficient sum to repay the Government expenditure with interest at 4 per cent in a period of 30 years. A separate fund has even been created for this project.

Such proposed expenditure and similar expenditures should be lifted from the appropriation bills and included in the projects to be carried on under the foregoing proposal. This will materially aid in balancing the Budget, which must and will be balanced. It is fully realized that platitudinous statements and even definite proposals will mean nothing until concrete legislation is submitted to Congress. Therefore a bill to carry out the proposed program of the subcommittee is now in process of preparation and will be presented and introduced in the Senate in a few days.

It is apparent that there is a conflict of judgment with regard to relief legislation, yet it is fortunate that the administration and a majority of the Senate, as I believe, are in accord with regard to the major proposals for emergency relief.

We must realize that there are two schools of thought in this country and the proponents of each are sincere. One school of thought believes that we should spend only sufficient money to exist and thereby be enabled to reduce taxes. The proponents of this school of thought hold that the money thus relieved from taxation will go into private industry. They contend that by thus reducing expenditures they can collect sufficient in taxes to assure the payment of any debts the Governfent incurs and thus restore the confidence of capital. They urge that "There is no dearth of capital, and, on the other hand, there is a real demand for capital for productive purposes that have been held in abeyance."

The other school of thought, of which I am a member, is that the steady growth in depression can not be stopped until the market price of commodities rises above the cost of production; that such rise in commodity prices can not take place until the demand for our products is increased through the increase of the purchasing power of our people; that 40 per cent of the purchasers in our domestic market are laborers and those dependent upon them; that it follows, therefore, that labor must be employed, and, if individual industry can not afford to employ them, then the Government must employ them upon economically sound Government works until industry may assume its normal function as the employer.

The proponents of one school of thought believe that because we have nearly half of the gold of the world in our banks there is ample circulating currency. The other school of thought believes that this gold, frozen in the banks of the country, has failed to circulate and is not, in a true sense, circulating currency that may be used in trade transactions by the people of the country. One school of thought believes in maintaining the purchasing power of gold, while the other school of thought believes in depreciating to a reasonable extent the purchasing power of gold and relatively increasing the purchasing power of labor and commodities.

I have only briefly touched on proposed legislation that has reached a stage where it may be interpreted. Many other acts, such as the calling of an international silver conference and the purchase with silver certificates of silver produced in the United States, looking to the raising of the exchange value and purchasing power in our markets of the money of silver-money-using countries so that they may return to the purchase of our export goods, are under consideration.

International monetary conferences have been proposed. International tariff conferences were urged under the Democratic policy measure recently passed through Congress and vetoed by the President.

The House of Representatives and the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, in their desperate search for revenue, have placed certain articles now on the free list on the dutiable list. It is complained that such tariff items should not be attached to a revenue bill. They have been attached many times in the past. It is also contended that they are protective tariffs.

It may be answered that we are living under a high protective tariff system and that there should not be any discriminations against any industry. The copper industry, for instance, is attempting to continue the production of copper, although it has suffered a deficit for two years and is now attempting to produce copper at less than half of the average cost of the production of copper in the United States. We must not blame too severely citizens of States who are suffering desperately for seeking emergency legislation, no matter in what form and how extraordinary it may appear.

All of these things are complex problems upon which the minds of men naturally differ. However, they must be solved. We have no right to surrender. Congress will violate its duty, in my opinion, if it adjourns without acting upon all of these questions and doing everything in its power to bring order out of chaos, not only in our own country but throughout the world.

NATIONAL ORATORICAL CONTEST PRIZE ORATION

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, Miss Lucylle Goldsmith was the winner of the National Oratorical Contest held in Washington, D. C., on Saturday evening last. Miss Goldsmith is a pupil of the Benjamin Franklin High School of Los Angeles, Calif. The subject of her oration was "The Constitution—the Culmination of Centuries." It is an oration to be the author of which any Member of this body might well be proud. I ask respectfully that it may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the oration was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In spite of the turmoil and strife of this modern age, in spite of the many mistakes which mar the record of civilization's progress, there is one great truth which shows upon the horizon of this new day. It is a truth which above all else brings hope to man. It is so fundamental that those who understand its meaning must cease to doubt the success of this Nation's future. What is this truth? It is simply this, that regardless of the problems which confront our Nation, the people have an undying faith in that foundation of our governmental structure, the Constitution. They have this faith because they know that built into the Constitution are the fundamental needs of man. Our Constitution was not the product of 1787, nor was it the immediate creation of those who gave it form and substance at the Constitutional Convention. Its guaranties bear the brand of centuries for their justification and existence. It is great, not as many think, because of any one stroke of genius but rather it is great because it is the expression of the best results of man's struggle through the ages to learn how to govern himself. The living out of man's divine destiny necessitates certain great fundamental principles, such as domestic tranquillity, religious liberty, and individual liberty. The history of the ages is replete with accounts of man's victories achieved one by one to establish these principles in response to the requirements of his own God-given nature. The greatness of our Constitution lies in the fact that it is the embodiment of all these victories from the beginning of civilization to the signing of the last amendment.

There are buildings that soar to the sky; others remain close to the ground; but none can mount high unless its foundation is intrenched deeply, firmly into the ground. It can ascend just so high as that foundation allows. The makers of our Constitution knew that, and, mighty builders that they were, when they erected that invincible, that ever-growing building, the United States of America, they gleaned for its foundation the best from all of history.

Our idea of a senate we get from the Romans and from the Hebrew Sanhedrin of biblical times. That was one of the corner stones in the foundation. From England these draftsmen borrowed more material. Using the lessons taught by and the ideals of the Magna Charta of 1215, of the Petition of Right, of the habeas corpus act, of the Bill of Rights, they cemented the stones comprising this foundation yet more strongly together, intrenched them yet more firmly into the soil of personal liberty. The idea of a law so fundamental as to limit even the power of the ruler runs far back into the early story of England.

Stone and mortar of more recent origin were supplied by the State constitutions. From Maryland comes the idea of the Electoral College and of the small Senate with a long term of service. From New York comes the periodic readjustment of representation after each census and the Vice President's duty to preside over the Senate and to vote only in case of a tie. Massachusetts has contributed the duties of both houses with respect to impeachment and the power of the Executive veto. Some provisions, important in the composition of this puissant document, such as the judiciary system, the short term in the lower house, and the single executive were common to nearly all the States.

The provisions in our Constitution, which divide our Government into three departments—the executive, judicial, and legislative—each acting as a check upon the other, serving to guarantee against abuse of power by any one department in the Government, were not the inventions or creations of the framers of our Constitution, but go clear back to the Magna Charta of 1215, to the codes of European states, to the days of ancient Rome, and still farther removed to the times of the first organized governments.

What were the rights our Constitution sought to safeguard? What were the weapons it provided to insure our people against despots, tyrants, and autocrats? What were the rights our Constitution declared to be inalienable, and stripped legislatures and courts for centuries after of the power to repeal or modify? Were they merely the problems of a people living in the twilight of the eighteenth century, or were they problems which have always existed from the dawn of history? The provisions in our Constitution which guarantee to every citizen the right to a trial by jury, to freedom of speech, to freedom of assembly, to petition for redress of grievances, to religious liberty—are provisions which are found in less perfect documents long before the Constitutional convention was conceived.

Kingdoms, empires, dynasties may crumble and fall to pieces, but the fundamental principles of liberty and justice embodied in our Constitution will serve the governmental needs of man forever. Thus we may go on, building an ever finer and greater structure of our country, secure in the knowledge that its foundation rests on principles wrought out through ages of actual human experience. Thus, we have a glorious foundation for a glorious structure, and that structure—of liberty, of justice, of hope—rises to the sky, glorifying the contribution of the ages, secure on the foundation that is the life of our Nation—the Constitution.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I offer and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, after line 9, insert the following:

(9) Copra, including products of the Philippine Islands, hempseed, palm nuts, kapok seed, palm nut kernels, tung nuts, rapeseed, perilla seed, sesame seed, rubber seed, 1 cent per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

(10) Coconut oil, the product of the Philippine Islands and other countries, palm oil, perilla and sweet almond oil, tung oil, herring oil, pilchard oil, whale oil, seal oil, sperm oil, crude, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

(11) Palm-kernel oil, sunflower oil, sesame oil, rapeseed oil, olive oil, all the foregoing if in inedible form, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is twofold. It will place a tax upon certain commodities that are now imported into this country in large quantities without paying an import tax, and I am informed it will, under the proposed rates, yield a revenue of $24,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Where is the amendment to be inserted in the bill?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is to be inserted on page 244 after line 9, following the lumber amendment.

Mr. FESS. Does it come in as a separate paragraph?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that it is a separate paragraph.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the amendment include all products imported from the Philippine Islands to the United States?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; it includes copra and its products produced in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I had hoped that it would include all Philippine products.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In order that we may follow the argument of the Senator from Minnesota, will he be good enough to tell us what the present duties are upon each of the commodities and what is the duty he proposes?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. On copra, hempseed, palm nuts, kapok seed, palm-nut kernels, tung nuts, rapeseed, perilla seed, sesame seed, and rubber seed there is now proposed a tax of 1 cent a pound. There is no tax at present.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They are on the free list?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All these items?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. On coconut oil produced outside of the Philippines there is now a tariff of 2 cents a pound.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What duty does the Senator propose on coconut oil?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Two cents a pound.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator proposes that duty?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the duty now?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Two cents a pound.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the Senator is going to include coconut oil from the Philippine Islands and to retain the same rate?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. It will have this effect: That coconut oil imported from the Philippines will pay 2 cents in order to come into this country and coconut oil from outside of the Philippine Islands will pay 4 cents.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator proposes to double the present duty. It is 2 cents now, and the Senator proposes to change it to 4 cents.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. The Philippines now, on account of having free entry for coconut oil, have a monopoly of imports of that product into the United States. Under this amendment they will have practically the same monopoly, because they will be able to sell their coconut oil here 2 cents cheaper than any other country producing coconut oil.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is that the item that will produce the most revenue?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will give the figures as to the production of revenue. The estimated revenue from coconut oil under this proposal will be $15,272,000. It would produce more revenue than any of the other tariff items in this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The tariff items together will only produce $6,000,000, so the amendment will produce much more than all of them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

The Senator asked for the other items that are covered by the tariff. There are some here that are so covered. There are included in the amendment herring oil, pilchard oil, on which there is a tariff of 5 cents a gallon; whale oil has a tariff of 6 cents a gallon; seal oil has a tariff of 6 cents a gallon; and sperm oil, crude, has a tariff of 10 cents a gallon. There will be added to the existing rates an additional 2 cents a pound.

The total revenue from all these items is estimated at something over $24,000,000. That is one purpose of offering the amendment, but there is another purpose. There is a different situation, I think, in connection with these items possibly than in the case of coal, lumber, and oil, because we were told that duties on those commodities would not raise their price to the consumer. I am frank to confess that I believe, at least I am informed, that if this amendment shall become a part of the bill and a part of the law it will raise the price of butter, because most of these oils which come in here are used in competition with butter and to make imitation butter.

They are bought at a very low price. Some of these oils used to command a price of 17 cents a pound, but can now be bought for 3½ cents. It costs about 6 cents a pound to make a pound of oleomargarine to be sold in competition with butter. I am informed it cost 21 cents a pound to make a pound of butter and place it on the market. I am also informed that, so far as vitamins are concerned, it takes 24 pounds of vegetable oil oleomargarine to equal in food value 1 pound of butter.

Some one has called this a tariff bill. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I did not want to make it a tariff bill. But it is one now. It has been said here upon the floor of the Senate that those of us who have voted to keep this revenue bill from becoming a tariff bill and are now coming to ask for items under the tariff are requesting those who fought for tariff items to "divide the swag" with us. We are not asking them to "divide any swag" with us.

A very able Senator told me to-day that it was an old maxim of equity that "he who comes asking equity must come with clean hands." I have never seen clean hands in a tariff bill. We who represent farming communities never dreamed of having equity dealt out to us in a tariff bill. We never did. We are in the position of the man who has had his pockets picked and asks for car fare to his home.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. When the farmers asked for an increase of the tariff on casein, the rate on which was 2½ cents, and, through the efforts of some of us, the rate was raised to 5½ cents, that was giving some relief, according to the petitioners, was it not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Undoubtedly; but I happen to be talking of equity.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Was not that equitable, just, and right? I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is on the ground of equity, then the Senator from California, who voted against the debenture amendment proposed in order to give the farmer equity, has got a confession to make or a plea in avoidance.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. On another occasion I will endeavor, with permission, to make reply to my learned brother from Nebraska.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I believe the Senator from Minnesota mixed the maxims of equity. One is that he who seeks equity must do equity; and then there is the other maxim that he who comes into court and asks for equity must come with clean hands.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is right.

Mr. LONG. The point I desire to make is that it rather seems the Senator ought not to undertake to live in a house that he has done everything he could to burn down.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I tried to explain that our position is that of a man who has had his pocket picked, or who has been robbed, and is asking those who robbed him to give him car fare so that he may get home.

Mr. NORRIS. From the Senator's experience during to-day and the few days that have recently passed he ought to know better than to ask these fellows to give him car fare. We know they will not do it. They have robbed us, it is true, and they are laughing about it and delighted with it, and ride in their limousines with their chauffeurs and pass us by while we are trudging along afoot.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. After the vote on the Senator's amendment I realize we can not get car fare home, but I was at least trying by this amendment to get something to eat on the way home. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I speak figuratively, but that is the position of the farmer when it comes to legislation; that is the way he has been treated.

I was very much interested in the enumeration of the groups that have come here to get aid and comfort from the Congress at this session of Congress. They are the same old interests that have always come here—the banks, the railroads, coal, oil, lumber, copper, and foreign governments. They have all come to get their aid and comfort. It is the same old story. The soldiers came here and were told to go home. The farmers come here asking for something, and they are told, "This is not for you."

Instead of making an argument in regard to the inequitable distribution of the largess of Congress, which has been covered here this afternoon, I simply want to point out in all seriousness that this amendment which I propose is really a revenue measure rather than a tariff measure, because I am informed that it will not in any sense prove to be an embargo; and I am also informed that it will reduce very little, if at all, the imports of these products.

The objection may be made that under this amendment we are compelling the Philippine Islands to pay something for bringing coconut oil in here. They are protected. They would still have a monopoly of the importation into the United States of coconut oil, because they could bring it in here at 2 cents a pound cheaper than it can be brought from any other country. In the present stress of the United States, with a Treasury deficit, I do not believe, as a friend of the Philippines, that it is asking too much that they pay a little toward the expenses of conducting the Government of the United States, which gives them protection, and help to balance the Budget.

The only people who have objected to taxes upon these imports have been the manufacturers of soap. I want to point out that they have done very well; that they can afford to pay a little something toward the contribution that is expected to be made to the balancing of the Budget.

The soap manufacturers have played the American farmers against the producer of foreign oils for the last two decades. They have used cheap foreign oil to depress the domestic oil markets, and they have been highly successful.

In 1912, 81 per cent of the oils used in the soap industry were domestic oils. Then the soap manufacturers went after foreign oils, and to-day 56 per cent of the oils used in the manufacture of soap are domestic oils. In 1931 they bought coconut oil for 3½ cents a pound, while in 1920 they paid 17 cents a pound. Palm oil dropped from 11½ cents to 4 cents during the same period. The farmer suffered accordingly. Inedible tallow dropped from 13 cents a pound in 1920 to 3½ cents a pound in 1931, and cottonseed oil from 15½ cents a pound to 6 cents a pound during the same period.

Mr. President, in the last tariff bill this item was discussed in detail. It is not my purpose to carry on an extended argument on this measure, because it has been before the Senate heretofore. It is on a raw material coming in here in competition with our production. There will be no material diminution in imports. From the imports of 1931 it is estimated that the revenue will amount to $24,000,000. It will give some measure of relief to the producers of dairy products, particularly butter, with which these products come in competition. We can not successfully compete, in producing butter at 21 cents a pound, with a raw material that can be bought for 3½ cents a pound.

I am not going to say that this amendment will not raise the price of butter to the consumer. I hope it will. The farmer must get something back for what he is going to pay in this tariff bill. If, however, it does not help the farmer by making it possible for him to get a better price for his butter, it will do one thing that we can not deny, and that is, it will bring to the Government a revenue of about $24,000,000.

A great deal of unemployment, I am informed, is prevailing along the coast among the fishery people. These products come in from abroad in competition; and as a result of the fact that it is claimed that the existing tariff is not sufficient to make it possible for them to compete it is necessary to have this protection for the fishing industry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator's amendment was read. Will he have the goodness, if it does not divert him, to state just what the items affected are? I did not have the benefit of hearing them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The items affected are copra, hempseed, palm nuts, kapok seed, palm-nut kernels, perilla seed, sesame seed, and rubber seed, now on the free list, which will come in at 1 cent a pound.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator's suggested amendment is 1 cent a pound?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; 1 cent a pound. They are now on the free list. The second paragraph contains these oils:

Coconut oil at 2 cents a pound from every country except the Philippine Islands. This paragraph raises the tax 2 cents, and will include the Philippine Islands. From the Philippines the tax will be 2 cents a pound. From outside the Philippines it will be 4 cents.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I see.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then palm oil, perilla and sweet almond oil, tung oil—these are the finished products of the raw material in paragraph 1—herring oil, pilchard oil, whale oil, seal oil, and sperm oil, crude, are taxed 2 cents per pound on the finished product.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. An increase of the rates?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. With the exception of coconut oil. The rest, except fish oils, have no tariff.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am following the Senator with much interest.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator honors me.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Would the Senator have the kindness to point out wherein the suggested rates would be of service to our fishing industry? He has made just brief allusion to it. If he would have the kindness to elaborate that thought a little bit, I think it would help the cause.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether it would be agreeable to him to permit this matter to go over until to-morrow after he has finished his address to-night? I desire to discuss it, and I am not prepared to discuss it to-night. I should like, if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota, to permit it to go over until to-morrow, if the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I shall be very glad to comply with the Senator's request.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] is going to make reply to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that he does not want final action on this item to-night because he desires to speak upon it to-morrow?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. That will not prevent the Senator from Missouri from proceeding.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not at all; and if I can have that understanding, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not to vote to-night; that is all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand, the Senator does not want to vote until to-morrow, and he would like to have time to discuss this amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to have a little time to discuss it to-morrow. I do not want to have to discuss it to-night.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Any arrangement the Senator can make will be agreeable to me.

Mr. SMOOT. What I should like to do would be to go on with the discussion as long as there is anyone to speak on it to-night, and then lay it aside until to-morrow morning, when the Senator from Delaware will take it up the first thing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So far as I am concerned, I have said about all I have to say on the subject. The Senator from Delaware will discuss what the Senator from California inquired about this afternoon. I put in that part of the amendment at the request of constituents for whom he speaks, and he can speak with greater information on the subject than I can. If the Senator from Missouri wants to continue the discussion, I should be very glad to yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield the floor?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I should like to discuss the amendment briefly to-morrow.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield the floor.

Mr. HAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw that request. Can we not agree——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I withdraw it for the moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] has the floor. He has yielded for a quorum call. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Costigan	Hawes	Reed
Bankhead	Couzens	Hebert	Sheppard
Barbour	Davis	Hull	Shipstead
Bingham	Dickinson	Johnson	Shortridge
Blaine	Dill	Jones	Smoot
Bratton	Fess	Keyes	Steiwer
Broussard	Frazier	La Follette	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	George	Logan	Townsend
Bulow	Glenn	Long	Trammell
Byrnes	Goldsborough	McGill	Tydings
Capper	Gore	McNary	Vandenberg
Carey	Hale	Moses	Watson
Cohen	Harrison	Norris	White
Connally	Hastings	Nye
Coolidge	Hatfield	Patterson

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the friends of Philippine independence have not attempted to push in the Senate the various bills presented looking to that end. We have felt that the first problem to be solved by the Nation was that relating to the balancing of the Budget and reduction of the expenses of Government; when that is completed, we will pass a Philippine independence bill.

Some six weeks ago the House of Representatives, by a vote of 306 to 47, passed a bill providing for the independence of the Philippines. If we add 42 absentees who favor the bill to the number voting, the result demonstrates a remarkable degree of unanimity in the House.

The amendment offered by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] I know is not intended to interfere with the Philippines, and I know the Senator is in favor of Philippine independence. I am quite confident that in the Senate there are 76 assured votes for Philippine independence when that question comes before this body, and I would be very much surprised if the vote were not greater than that. But this amendment of the Senator from Minnesota presents a very interesting question.

When the Philippine Islands came into the possession of the United States, our Government, recognizing the trade relations of the Philippines with Spain and the rest of the world, allowed 10 years for the readjustment of those relations, and during that period we might almost say the old Spanish law governing those relations prevailed. Then, in 1909, it was proposed in the Congress of the United States that trade relations between the Philippines and our country should be put upon a free-trade basis. The Filipino people objected. Their legislature passed a resolution opposing it. Their public men and their newspapers opposed it, because they believed at that time that if free trade were established, it would unduly increase the production of certain articles in those islands and that it would establish a relationship which later, when they sought to secure their independence, would present severe obstacles to independence.

This amendment of the Senator from Minnesota provides that we continue our control over these people, and, at the same time, tax their exports. Time and time again before the committees of the House of Representatives and before the committees of the Senate the question of a limitation of Philippine exports and a tariff on their exports to our country has been presented. The question of a limitation of immigration also has been brought before the committees of both branches of the Congress. But every time such questions have been presented, some great Republican or some great Democrat, and all the executive departments of our Government, have, I am glad to say, appeared in opposition to such treatment. To hold these people as subject wards, to hold them with their hands tied behind them and helpless, and to strike them in the face, would be a thing Americans would not be proud of.

I need mention only two men. There was Elihu Root, an ornament to this body, one of the great men of the Nation, who protested against such thing being done in his own vigorous, eloquent way, upon the Republican side. On the Democratic side was Oscar Underwood. The War Department and the State Department have, on every occasion when it was sought to put tariff duties upon imports from the Philippine Islands, appeared before the committees and objected. That objection came from all administrations since 1909. Starting under a Republican administration, the policy of fair and just treatment of the Philippines continued until the last Democratic administration, under Woodrow Wilson.

We send our American products to the Philippines without duty; we can not honorably do this and place a tariff upon Philippine products; if we place a tax upon their production, we must permit them to tax our products.

Everyone has conceded that it would not be fair to these people to introduce free trade over their objection, over their protest; build up businesses in the islands under that arrangement, and then, when those businesses had grown to be a powerful economic factor in the trade relations between the United States and the Philippines, suddenly to change our policy. The Philippines was not responsible for the development of these industries; it was the program of the American Congress that did it.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that before Congress adjourns it will keep its promise to the Philippine people. The House of Representatives has registered its voice in that matter. It is only a matter of three or four weeks' delay at the most, and then any one of the bills—the bill which passed the House, the bill reported by the Senate committee, or the substitute suggested by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—would in an equitable, proper way solve this problem.

I can not see how we could face the world, how we could face these 13,000,000 wards of ours while holding them under the administration of the United States, and passing laws which control them, at the same time strike down the products of those islands.

The philosophy of these Philippine bills, upon which the Senate will soon vote, embodies the theory of limitations; that is to say, it stops the expansion in the production of certain of their exports. Then it goes farther. After a period of adjustment has been allowed, a tariff barrier is to begin. But it would be a politically immoral act, I think conceded by everyone, while holding the Philippines, without setting a definite date for their independence, to curtail either their exports or to put tariff duties upon those exports to the United States. It would be a thing of which the American people should be ashamed.

Time and time again this question has come up during our 30 years of sovereignty over the islands, and in every case where a committee has registered its voice or a great American has spoken that committee or that great American has said that to treat the Philippines as wards, with unfairness, with discrimination, would be almost as bad as to draw the line between citizens of different States of the Union.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator permit me to state that, although there are many interests in my State which are keenly concerned in the strictest possible limitation upon Philippine imports into the United States, I completely and cordially and unequivocally concur in the statement of our responsibility and duty which the Senator is now making?

Mr. HAWES. I thank the Senator. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who has given a more conscientious study to this problem than has the Senator from Michigan. The more this problem is studied the more certain will be the voice of the Senate—that to put a burden upon the Philippine people prior to a definite statement of American policy would be an act of political immorality. Of course, I am not reflecting upon the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], because, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has said, the people of his State want this question settled. Five million members of union labor are asking for its settlement; 6,500,000 farmers are asking for its settlement; 17 beet States want it settled; 5 sugar States want it settled. The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] knows that the Pacific coast demands a definite clean-cut settlement at this session of Congress in the matter of immigration.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With unfeigned respect for the views of the Senator, he will permit me to dissent from his views in so far as they relate to the migration or the immigration of Filipino laborers to the United States. First, I observe that for many years I have taken a position in favor of granting to those ten or eleven million people their complete independence. If I had the power, I would grant that independence much more quickly or sooner than either of the bills which are now pending and which are designed to grant that independence.

But as to the migration or the coming hither of Filipino labor, I have taken the position and, with great respect for the Senator, I hold the position that it would be for the interests of the Filipino people themselves to restrict or to stop that immigration. It is quite true, as the Senator has just remarked, that the whole Pacific coast people are in favor of stopping that immigration. I think they are practically unanimous in favor of granting Philippine independence.

When during the last session of Congress I introduced a bill to stop that immigration, I received from practically every labor union on the Pacific coast, certainly practically every labor union in California, telegrams approving and earnestly hoping for the passage of such a measure. I have reintroduced that bill, which is pending before our Committee on Immigration. As a friend of the Filipino people, I urge the passage of that bill. As a friend of our own people, I urge its passage. I think it would be for the benefit of both the Filipinos and the American people to stop that immigration now, before the granting of independence, which I favor.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator might go a little bit farther. He might add that there is not a State upon the Pacific coast, a Congressman or Senator upon the Pacific coast, who is not demanding a solution of this problem. The Senator has probably read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the statement of the American Federation of Labor, comprising some 5,000,000 men. He has probably read of our colored citizens, who in their papers are demanding a definite certain solution of this problem. So the demand for a solution and a wiping out of this uncertainty, while it is unanimous upon the Pacific coast, extends throughout America.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me further to interrupt him?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have said I favor granting independence to the Filipino people. I would not defer it to as remote a date as is fixed in the one or the other of the bills referred to; but pending that I favor the stopping or the shutting off the Filipino labor migration, and for reasons which it is not necessary for me now to state. The condition of our labor in America, the state of unemployment in America to-day, in my judgment warrants such legislation. I am not in dissent from the Senator's general view in respect to the early granting of independence to those people.

Mr. HAWES. May I say to the Senator from California that we promised these people their independence. It has been the policy of every President since McKinley to promise or to hold out the hope that in the near future they would have independence. But it may interest the Senator from California to know that at one period of our history the Filipinos were led to believe that they might be incorporated as a part of the United States and become a State of the Union. One of the most dramatic recitals I ever listened to was by an old Filipino leader who, after Aguinaldo's surrender, came to the United States. He headed a party in the Philippines to demand statehood for those islands, and amongst others, he called upon Mr. Elihu Root. He was told by that gentleman and he was told by others that the problem of a new nationality, a new racial element in our body politic, would not succeed. That party in the Philippines died because nowhere in our country was a hope held out.

So, may I say to the Senator from California I do not think it is fair, holding those people as we do, partly under our flag and partly under their flag, with no settled nationality, but under our sovereignty, under our control, under the jurisdiction of Congress, unable to defend themselves except in the matter of protest, either to limit immigration, raise a tariff barrier, or put a burden upon those people, when we are solely responsible for the present situation ourselves. I think if the Senator with his great energy and his knowledge of the disposition of the Pacific coast will help the friends of Philippine independence to secure a vote before we adjourn, which has been promised by the leadership on both sides, the question in which he is interested can be settled definitely and finally within the next three weeks.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator if the bill which bears the Senator's name provides the time for the granting of the independence?

Mr. HAWES. There are two bills. The one from the House provides for independence after eight years, but upon the passage of the bill immigration is limited to 100 annually. The Senate bill provides for independence after 15 years and upon the adoption of a constitution, which is a matter of one year, then the inhibition begins. So there is approximately a difference of one year in the inhibition between the House bill and the Senate bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But does each bill provide for a limited migration?

Mr. HAWES. Yes; limited to 100 annually.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. As to our presence in the Philippines and holding them, as claimed, somewhat in subjection, of course it must be admitted that we have been an unmixed blessing to the Philippine people. We broke the Spanish yoke of 300 years. I claim we have been an unmixed blessing to them. To repeat myself, looking forward to their independence, to the necessity for the development of their natural resources, it will be to their benefit to restrict the migration of their laboring people; it will be for their benefit to remain in their native country, even though under our quasi or full jurisdiction. They will be needed at home after they have become free and completely independent—as I hope they will soon become.

I do not wish my country to rest under the imputation that we are holding them in subjection, or that it is wrong to restrict their coming to the United States. I think it will be beneficial to the laboring people of those islands, and beyond question it will be beneficial to our country, to stop this immigration. Our first duty is to the United States. I may be wrong, but I hold to that view.

Mr. HAWES. Historically speaking, when our great Admiral Dewey steamed into Manila Bay, he sent for Aguinaldo and brought him from Hong Kong. He gave him arms and ammunition and Aguinaldo's army drove the Spanish from every portion of the Philippine Islands into the City of Manila. He cut off their water supply. It was a Philippine army that held the Spanish in the city of Manila for three and one-half months, before our American troops arrived. I am convinced in my own mind that so far as the Spanish are concerned, they would have been driven out of the islands without the assistance of our Americans. Of course, the great things we have done for the Philippine Islands in the matter of sanitation and education and the teaching of English and of our philosophy of government have been the most magnificent things done in the history of the world by a great people for a smaller nation.

Now the time has come when we must redeem our promise. The younger Filipinos each day are demanding independence with greater earnestness and more vigor. Senators read this morning, I am sure, the statement of our former ambassador to Japan, Mr. Forbes, which has a distinct bearing on this subject.

Mr. President, I hope that Senators will not press amendments either for the exclusion of the Filipinos or for the erection of tariff barriers against Philippine products until we can pass upon the question of Philippine independence. Then we will be able to take action honorably and in keeping with the best traditions of our country.

As to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, let me say I am in a way sympathetic with it. Those engaged in dairying in my section are complaining; the cotton growers are complaining; they do not like commodities produced by cheap labor on cheap land coming in free and competing with our domestic dairy products and farm products. However, I ask the Senator to delay just for two or three weeks in presenting this question. When independence comes, then the voice of labor, the voice of agriculture, the voice of the 17 sugar States asking for protection against the free entry of products competing with them, I know will be answered here in very definite terms, and we will settle the question in accordance with the better traditions of America, and not in a manner for which we may later have to apologize.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in view of the discussion some time ago, it was tentatively agreed that this amendment should go over until to-morrow, in order to give the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] an opportunity to discuss it. If a definite arrangement can be made that the amendment shall come up when the Senate convenes to-morrow morning, that the Senator from Delaware will then take the floor and discuss the amendment, and that the discussion shall continue until a vote is had on the amendment, such an arrangement will be very agreeable to me. I have no desire to prolong the debate, but I believe that Senators who are interested in the amendment should have an opportunity to be heard. So, if an arrangement, such as I have suggested, can be definitely entered into, it will be agreeable to me to have the amendment go over.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, that was agreed to, was it not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It was not definitely agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I have no objection to such an agreement being entered into.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be laid aside until the Senate convenes to-morrow morning; that at that time the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] may take the floor, and that the discussion of the amendment shall continue until a vote is had upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the amendment may be temporarily passed over, with the understanding that it shall be pending to-morrow when the Senate convenes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of its business to-day, the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has the Senator given consideration to the question of meeting at 10 o'clock each morning and running until 7 or 8 in the evening without having night sessions?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the time has arrived when we can proceed in that way. The question was brought to my attention to-day, but such an arrangement would only give us nine hours.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that I am willing to abide by the present rule of working until 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock, or even 12 o'clock, if that will speed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. So am I.

Mr. CONNALLY. And put the bill through, because the country wants it put through, and it ought to be put through; but, candidly, I believe that if we would meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and work hard all day until 7 or 8 o'clock and then adjourn, we should make more progress than by holding night sessions. I say that for this reason: The night session is a sort of a grand opera; there is a wonderful gallery; the newspaper men are all here, and the temptation to indulge in oratory is aggravated and stimulated and exaggerated until those who have power to entertain, or think they have, take up the time in debate, frequently on questions that do not pertain to the immediate subject matter. So my purpose in suggesting to the Senator that we consider such an arrangement is in the interest of economy of time and holding the nose of the Senate to the items of this bill until we get through with it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is much merit in what the Senator says.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. And I will take the suggestion under consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senate has really made up its mind that it is going to pass this bill, then I am perfectly willing to adopt the course suggested, and then let us stick right to such an arrangement and make Senators talk to the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. But how can we do it? How can we make them talk to the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. We can not unless they will agree to do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator it is now 7.20 p. m.; we are going on with the bill, where are the Senators? There is no gallery here. Within an hour, however, when the gallery fills, Senators will be here on the floor. I believe that if we could work all day long and hold the nose of the Senate to the grindstone on this bill we would get through much more quickly than we will by holding night sessions. I want to see the bill passed; we have been working on it, as the Senator knows, in the Finance Committee for five weeks all day long, and I think Senators ought to stay here and work on this bill and get it through.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not agree to any such arrangement to-night, for the reason——

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not going to insist on it to-night, but will the Senator consider it to-morrow and let us determine whether or not we will adopt that sort of a program?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that a number of Senators have objected to the plan he suggests. I have discussed it with them. They object for the simple reason that they have committee meetings. When we meet at 11 o'clock that gives only an hour for committee work; and if we should meet at 10 o'clock that would give them scarcely any time. We have only about an hour as it is now, and if we should meet at 10 there would be very little opportunity for committee meetings or other work.

Mr. CONNALLY. Where are those Senators now? They are not here. We are working, and they are not here.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. To the best of my knowledge, I have been here practically all the time, and I have not seen the bill advanced on its course by any of the night sessions. I do not think we have gained five minutes' time by holding night sessions.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been more real work done in some of the night sessions in voting on amendments than there has been at any time during the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 245, after line 4, to insert:

(8) Rubber, 5 cents a pound. All articles containing rubber, 5 cents a pound on the rubber contained therein. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles. As used in this paragraph, the term "rubber" includes all kinds of rubber and gutta-percha.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the rubber amendment has just been stated. I am sure the Senator desires to have that amendment go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Finance Committee will meet to-morrow morning at 9.30 to consider the rubber item, and therefore I ask that it go over.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that we ought to call for a quorum before we proceed? It was assumed that we would go on with the rubber amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think there was any question about it going over.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not questioning that; but that is not the point.

Mr. SMOOT. There can be a call for a quorum before we proceed with the automobile amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] had an amendment, as I recall, which he desired inserted at this place. I may be in error as to that, but that is my recollection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the rubber amendment will be passed over. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 245, after line 10, to strike out:

SEC. 602. TAX ON TOILET PREPARATIONS, ETC.

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Perfumes, essences, extracts, toilet waters, cosmetics, petroleum jellies, hair oils, pomades, hair dressings, hair restoratives, hair dyes, tooth and mouth washes, dentrifices, tooth pastes, aromatic cachous, toilet soaps, toilet powders, and any similar substance, article, or preparation, by whatsoever name known or distinguished; any of the above which are used or applied or intended to be used or applied for toilet purposes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The amendment was again stated.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment just stated is one of several amendments striking out provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 245, after line 22, to strike out:

SEC. 603. TAX ON FURS

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt or of which any such fur is the component material of chief value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 246, after line 3, to strike out:

SEC. 604. TAX ON JEWELRY, ETC.

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: All articles commonly or commercially known as jewelry, whether real or imitation; pearls, precious and semiprecious stones, and imitations thereof; articles made of, or ornamented, mounted or fitted with, precious metals or imitations thereof or ivory (not including surgical instruments); watches; clocks; opera glasses; lorgnettes; marine glasses; field glasses; and binoculars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Coolidge	Johnson	Sheppard
Bailey	Copeland	Jones	Shipstead
Bankhead	Couzens	Kean	Shortridge
Barbour	Davis	Keyes	Smith
Barkley	Dickinson	La Follette	Smoot
Bingham	Dill	Lewis	Steiwer
Blaine	Fess	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Frazier	Long	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	George	McGill	Townsend
Brookhart	Glenn	McNary	Trammell
Broussard	Gore	Moses	Tydings
Bulkley	Hale	Norris	Vandenberg
Bulow	Harrison	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Byrnes	Hastings	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Capper	Hatfield	Patterson	Watson
Carey	Hayden	Pittman	White
Cohen	Hebert	Reed
Connally	Hull	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do I understand that we have now reached page 246, the tax on automobiles?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 602. The clerk will state the amendment first.

Mr. BINGHAM. At this point, in accordance with the announcement which I made yesterday, as we have gotten through with the import duties on various products and have passed over temporarily the subject of rubber and are about to take up the question of automobiles, I desire to have taken up my amendment, which is on the desk, and which provides for striking out the committee's proposal on page 246, line 23, of 3 per cent on automobile trucks, and so forth, restoring it to 2 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not yet been stated. The clerk will state the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. The amendment which I have to offer covers a considerable number of matters in the tax bill. Therefore I desire to offer it at this time; and if it is necessary, I shall explain it.

Before doing that, however, in view of the fact that it was not expected that this measure should come up at this evening session, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be voted on at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, in order to give everyone an opportunity to know that it is coming up, because a number of Senators who are not present this evening desire to vote against it, and some Senators who are not present will vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he will not make that not later than 2 o'clock?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. And does the Senator desire that when the Senate reconvenes at 11 o'clock to-morrow, he and other Senators shall occupy the time on this amendment up to 2 o'clock?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be ready to take it up at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. I should have been ready this evening had I had any idea that it was coming up; but in view of the fact that we had the copra amendment before us, and the rubber amendment, I told a number of Senators that I thought it could not possibly come up this evening.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] whether he is prepared to go on with the automobile amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what position that leaves us in. I am ready to proceed with the automobile section to a conclusion. Suppose we proceed with the section to a conclusion before we reach to-morrow and the Senator's proposition, in what position would the Senator find himself, and in what position would we find ourselves?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator proposes to strike out the tax on automobiles entirely. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct. I propose to take a test on the general question by moving, as a substitute for the committee amendment, to strike out all of paragraph (a).

Mr. SMOOT. Of what section?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Paragraph (a) of section 602.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is trying to get this amendment clarified. The Chair will state that the committee amendment takes precedence, and will have to be acted on first. Is not the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut just the reverse of the committee amendment? In other words, would not a negative vote on the committee amendment do what the Senator's amendment seeks to accomplish?

Mr. BINGHAM. A part of the amendment which I desire to offer includes a disagreement with the committee amendment, but that is only a small part of it. I understand that the Senator from Michigan desires to strike out the entire paragraph (a) as it came from the House.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Even though we proceed with this section, and even though it should be concluded one way or another this evening, would not the Senator from Connecticut still be in position to proceed with his substitute, which offers a substitute source of revenue?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the Senator that if the amendment which he proposes, to strike out section (a), is adopted, then I shall be very glad to alter my amendment accordingly, and strike out something else. The whole object of the amendment which I have proposed, and which is lying on the desks of Senators, is to make it possible to legalize the manufacture and sale of beer of 2.75 per cent alcohol by weight, and raise a revenue conservatively estimated at $375,000,000, and therefore not make it necessary to place the taxes on automobiles at the rate suggested by the committee. If the Senate is willing to strike out entirely paragraph (a), as desired by the Senator from Michigan, it would then be perfectly possible for me to make this amendment which I desire to offer applicable to some other section of the bill, thereby relieving the taxpayers of another amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, why would not the better plan be to offer the Senator's amendment as a separate paragraph, and proceed with it in that way?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Michigan proposes to save the taxpayers even more than I do on the question of automobiles, I am entirely willing to let him proceed until a vote has been reached on his amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish the Senator would put in the RECORD, if he can make a fairly accurate estimate of it, the amount of money which his amendment would yield, and how it will be used to replace other excise taxes now in the bill, so that we can all get an idea, if we vote for his amendment, to what extent we can substitute that revenue for the contemplated revenue of other excise taxes, and just how the Senator proposes to use that revenue in replacing other excise taxes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the Senator that I shall be very glad to do that; but I should prefer to debate it tomorrow morning, beginning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator if his present amendment is not on a basis of 2.75 per cent by weight?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct, Mr. President. At the request of several Senators who were in doubt as to the constitutionality of voting for beer that is 4 per cent by volume and 3.2 per cent by weight I changed it to 2.75 per cent by weight, which is about equivalent to 3.6 per cent by volume, because, that being the point at which war-time beer was made legal, they believe that in view of all the affidavits made before the Supreme Court at the time of the celebrated case there is no question whatever that beer of an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight is nonintoxicating, whereas, notwithstanding the testimony offered before the Committee on Manufactures, there is some question in the minds of some Senators that beer of an alcoholic content of 3.2 per cent by weight, or 4 per cent by volume, might be considered to be unconstitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment which is before the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 246, line 23, the committee proposes to strike out "2 per cent" and insert "3 per cent."

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry. What was done with section 602, the tax on toilet preparations?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate committee amendment was agreed to, Mr. President, striking that out.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendments with reference to sections 602, 603, and 604 have been agreed to?

Mr. SMOOT. They have been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. In each of those cases I desire to enter a motion to reconsider. I do that for this purpose: If, in the course of the consideration of this bill, we should need additional revenue from some source in order to balance the Budget, it may be necessary for us to go to some item that the House has passed. So I am merely doing that as a formality, in order to take care of the situation which might arise in case it is necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat those sections and designate them?

Mr. HARRISON. We have just agreed to the committee amendments striking out the tax on toilet preparations, section 602; the tax on furs, section 603; and the tax on jewelry, section 604.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of the fact that we have reached a tentative agreement that this matter may be considered to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a very remarkable letter which I have received from the representative of the International Steel Co. at Evansville, Ind., stating what in his opinion would be the immediate and simultaneous effect of adopting the amendment which I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

INTERNATIONAL STEEL CO.,
Evansville, Ind., May 20, 1932.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BINGHAM: Two hundred thousand restaurant buildings, creating a real-estate boom and requiring thousands of building mechanics, painters, decorators, etc.; 200,000 gas stoves; 200,000 radios; 200,000 refrigerators; 200,000 meters; 200,000 sets of bar fixtures (including soda fountains); 200,000 sets of furniture; 200,000 sets of cutlery, dishes, glassware; 200,000 cash registers; 200,000 showcases; 200,000 electrical fixtures; 200,000 sets of electric fans; 200,000 linoleums; 200,000 desks, safes, etc.; 200,000 sets of decorations; 200,000 users of farm products, gas, electricity, heat, etc.; 200,000 proprietors; 400,000 to 600,000 restaurant employees; and 200,000 of many other items for restaurants.

Hundreds of thousands of brewery workers, bottle workers, bottle-cap workers, coopers, coal miners, farmers, railroaders, machinists, building mechanics, painters, tinners, truck drivers, truck factory workers, etc. Twenty thousand trucks, thousands of automobiles, and millions of dollars' worth of new equipment for breweries.

A great boon in the stock and bond markets, bringing millions of dollars into circulation and into closed and open banks.

Millions of dollars would come out of hiding.

Revival of foreign trade.

Restored confidence and the purchase of that mighty volume of deferred necessities.

The above, in my opinion, would be the immediate and simultaneous requirements and effects should 2¾ per cent beer by weight be determined nonintoxicating in fact, on the following basis:

First. Using the population of Evansville, Ind., as a comparative basis for the 15 States which, when national prohibition first became effective, permitted the sale of alcoholic beverages. Therefore, the above figures are for those 15 States only.

Second. Legalizing the sale of beer in restaurants (each old saloon to be replaced by a restaurant where coffee, tea, ice cream, etc., would also be sold).

Sincerely yours,

F. O. WEBER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair may state that there seems to be a misunderstanding as to what is to take place to-morrow. Before the Senator from Connecticut came into the Chamber an agreement was reached that we would pass over the vegetable-oil amendment, and that it should be taken up at 11 o'clock to-morrow. That agreement has already been entered into.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, for the purpose of getting this issue squarely before the Senate, I move as a substitute for the committee amendment that all of subsection (a) in section 602 be stricken from the bill. I understand the parliamentary situation to be that the committee amendment, being a perfecting amendment to the text, will have to be voted upon first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But that subsequently my motion to strike out can then be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Therefore, I submit this amendment as the basis for what I want to say, with brevity, in respect to this proposition. In the main, I shall confine myself to the visual exhibits which were submitted to the Senate Finance Committee by the spokesmen for the automotive industry.

I want to preface these observations with a statement of four fundamental propositions, which indicate the nature of the appeal which I am submitting to the Senate.

First. The automotive industry does not ask for tax immunity. On the contrary, it has stated without equivocation that it will take its share of any universal tax which the necessities of Government may require. This is not a plea, therefore, for special favor; it is simply a plea against special and ruinous discrimination.

Second. Even this latter plea does not assert that the automotive industry particularly deserves tax justice on its own account; but it does assert that the country deserves the free and unhampered chance of domestic economic recovery, and of resurgent trade, which the automotive industry is best calculated and most bravely willing to inspire.

In other words, I shall undertake to prove to every Senator with open mind, first, that this special levy aimed at automobiles, trucks, and parts, is tax tyranny which blindly burdens a basic necessity of life and trade. Fiat logic to the contrary from the Treasury is no sounder than fiat money from that same exalted source.

Third. I shall undertake to prove that this is a tax against recaptured prosperity, and therefore is in violation of every motive and objective to which this Congress is presumptively dedicated.

I shall come immediately to the point and to the proofs; but as I submit the latter, I beg of Senators to remember that I am not speaking merely for automotive manufactories in my home State of Michigan, though Michigan happens to be the principal home of this sick but convalescent giant of modern times. I speak for the automotive industry as a whole, its labor, its capital, its sales and service agencies dotting every corner of every State in the Union—the greatest single universal economic stimulant and factor in modern American commerce.

I speak for this universality of national concern, a universality measured by the American ownership of 26,500,000 motor vehicles, which are 75 per cent of all the motor vehicles in all the world. I speak for more than 4,000,000 men of labor, who depend, directly and indirectly, upon this industry for their hopes of livelihood.

I speak by special mandate for organized agriculture in the United States which asks me to say to the Senate that the motor vehicle is as much an indispensable farm implement to-day as is the plow, and that motorized marketing is as essential as cooperative marketing for agriculture's success.

I speak, Mr. President, for the most inviting opportunity to break the vicious circle of this depression, and to provide the long-wanted and much-sought stimulation of trade. The automobile industry has dared to plan to do this thing. The question for the Senate to decide is whether it shall have this unhampered chance.

This latter is the vital consideration, because it rises above any expedient quest for handy tax targets and goes to the heart of our economic complex. The Treasury in its wisdom asked a basic 5 per cent penalty and impediment—I emphasize the word "impediment"—upon this key industry. As a matter of fact, the Treasury has always favored punishment at this point. The present Secretary objected to the repeal, even, of its war levies at the height of peace prosperity in 1927. He said, I hope prophetically, on October 31, 1927:

> Once the auto tax is removed, it can not be reimposed in time of peace.

The House cut the basic penalty to 3 per cent. The Senate Finance Committee put it up to 4 per cent. I am proposing, as did my distinguished colleague in the Senate Finance Committee, to wipe it out entirely and give agriculture a chance. At the particular moment the question is to be taken on that section of the tax dealing with trucks. The committee proposes to increase this rate from 2 to 3 per cent, and I propose to strike it out entirely.

Now to the proofs. I intend to be brief. Indeed, I intend to let the charts in the rear of the Senate speak substantially for themselves. I am appealing not merely for the ears of my colleagues but primarily for their eyes. I am appealing fundamentally for their common sense. I suppose it would be an anachronism to appeal to their horse sense in this connection. [Laughter.]

Proposition No. 1; and this is fundamental to the whole conception. The automobile has long since ceased to be a luxury, and anybody who undertakes to deal with the automobile in its relationship to American life on the luxury basis to-day absolutely reckons without his host. It is absolutely a necessity of life.

I do not believe that Congress will pick out this one necessity of life, single it out practically alone, among all the commodities in the market place of America, and victimize it with a discriminatory and burdensome assessment. There are too many other universal alternatives available.

Mark you, I say that proposition No. 1 is that the motor vehicle has come to be a necessity. There are more motor-vehicle registrations in the United States to-day than there are telephones, than there are domestic electric connections. It is a necessity of life.

Who is the typical automobile buyer at whom this tax is aimed? That is important, and it goes to the very crux of the problem. Who is the man at whom this tax is aimed?

Here upon this first chart is shown an authenticated net analysis of the automobile sales of the United States. The average man who buys an automobile in the United States has an income of $2,500; he is 40 years of age; he is married and has two children; he is buying a $3,000 home; he owns a $765 car; he spends annually for food $800, for clothing $275, for fuel and light $110, and the balance of his budget in other directions.

Here is the average man at whom this tax is aimed, I repeat. He is not a rich man; he is not even a man of moderate means. He is a type of the great mass citizenship of the country, with an income of not to exceed $2,500, and his car is a necessity to him, as we shall see as we proceed with the charts.

Let me suggest this, Mr. President, at this point: If this man is eligible for this motor tax, then a general sales tax would be even more logical. But if a general sales tax is not logical because of its burden upon mass consumption, then a special discriminatory motor tax aimed at this average man is completely illogical. Take your choice. In neither event is the special motor tax justified.

If one mass necessity is to be taxed, why not all? If none are to be taxed, why should this one productive commodity, belonging typically to this average man, with an income of $2,500, be selected to be victimized?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COUZENS. I may point out to the Senator that he is talking about the average man. That man, under the 1918 income-tax rate, would pay an income tax of $6, and under the rate in the pending bill, if he had a $700 car, at 4 per cent he would pay $28.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his observation. It bears squarely upon the general question of choosing alternatives which have an equity to support them instead of a discrimination to damn them.

Now let us look at the next chart.

> Nearly two-thirds of all new cars are bought by persons with a yearly income of less than $3,000.
> More cars are purchased by persons with incomes under $1,400 than by those having incomes over $6,500.

Not only that, but observe on the next chart the type of car, because the type of car bears finally upon the question of whether this is a luxury or a necessity. Observe the type of car which monopolizes the motor trade.

> Eighty-five per cent of all cars sell under $750 wholesale.

Here on the chart is a circle representing the total sales. Here is the 85 per cent under $750. Here is 7.9 per cent selling under $1,000, and only 6.4 per cent selling for over $1,000.

The price of cars purchased is just one more factor indicating to what extent automotion has become a mass service to mass Americans, which has been chosen, singled out, practically alone, among all commodities in the United States for discriminatory, burdensome, utterly hampering assessment in connection with this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to make the statement in regard to the number of people who purchase cars or the proportion of cars which are under the price of $1,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. How much would this mean in the matter of taxes to the man buying a car of $1,000?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It would mean $40 under the terms of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. What would be the additional cost he would have to pay on account of the tax levied on gasoline?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is a matter of argument. I do not think he will have to pay any additional cost in normal situations.

Mr. BORAH. I was anxious to know where the weight of this tax would fall. I suppose it would fall on the small man?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wonder if the Senator was in the Chamber when I showed the chart with the complete division upon it in respect to incomes? This is the chart which shows the yearly income group of the automobile owners and drivers of the country. The Senator will see that 1.4 per cent of the owners have incomes under $1,000; 1.2 per cent of the owners have incomes from $1,000 to $1,200. Then it follows on up to the peak. The largest single group is 30.3 per cent of car owners with incomes of $2,000 to $3,000. I think this is the information the Senator was seeking.

Mr. President, bearing still further upon the point of the question whether the automobile is a luxury which is entitled to be singled out for special discrimination at this time, or whether it is a necessity, I invite the attention of the Senate to another chart showing where the motor vehicles in use are to be found. Farmers own 26 per cent of all the trucks and 18 per cent of all the cars. Fifty-seven per cent of all the cars are on farms and in towns under 10,000 population. The balance of the chart breaks the figures down and indicates the distribution by groups.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Do these figures represent the new trucks and new cars that are purchased?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is my understanding that these figures represent the 1931 total registration.

Mr. BLAINE. But many of the farmers' trucks, probably a very large percentage of the farmers' trucks, are usually rebuilt or secondhand automobiles.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. BLAINE. They purchase a chassis for $75 or $100 and then pay some carpenter or they themselves make a box for the chassis. That constitutes a very large part of the farmers' trucks, as I have observed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall subsequently point out, in line with the Senator's' suggestion, for which I thank him, the proposal in this bill to single out parts and accessories for another discriminatory tax as a direct levy upon that farmer who is rebuilding his truck.

Make no mistake, Mr. President, as to the distribution of the ownership of these automobiles which are being recommended to the Senate by the Finance Committee for special discrimination, special assault, and special burden. About a week ago I was called upon in my office by a group of gentlemen which included Mr. L. J. Tabor, master of the National Grange; Mr. Fred Bowen, of Oklahoma City, representing the National Farmers Union; Mr. Charles A. Hurst, of Des Moines, Iowa, vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation; Mr. M. C. Hull, of Lansing, Mich., president of the National Dairy Union; and also the Washington representatives of those very farm organizations. It was their emphatic, unanimous, unequivocal statement that agriculture has a definite, specific, and unsurrendering desire for the elimination of these automotive taxes above any other amendments in the bill as it has come from the Senate Finance Committee. They believe these taxes are a tax on farm welfare.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, do I understand that the tax under the bill attaches to the sale of secondhand cars or used cars?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer that question. I refer it to the senior Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it applies to just the first sale of the car by the manufacturers.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator stated that farm leaders are in favor of eliminating this above any other tax. My telegrams from Mr. Hurst put oil first. He wanted the elimination of the oil and gasoline tax first and then the automobile tax came next.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is justified in saying that equal emphasis was put upon it in the general campaign which came from these organizations. I am stating that in the interview with me, which had nothing to do except with excise taxes, the whole emphasis of agriculture was put upon the need for relief from this particular discrimination against agriculture in respect of heavy, discriminatory motor taxes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator is proposing to strike out all excise taxes on this item?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the Senator's proposal.

Mr. BORAH. Is it his contention that they should pay no tax at all?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is my contention and it is their contention that they shall accept any tax which is general and universal. They made that frank and courageous statement to the committees in the House and the Senate. They have never complained to my knowledge against the increase in income taxes. They have never complained against any suggestion of a general sales tax. They are perfectly willing to take whatever the Senate concludes to be the best form of a universally applied assessment, and I am taking that position in presenting this matter to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's contention is that as a matter of equity it should go out entirely?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is my contention, that it should go out so far as it is a selective discriminatory assessment against this one commodity alone among all the commodities that are competing for the consumer's dollar in the American market place. I am going to undertake to prove to the Senate before I conclude that there is a distinct and specific economic reason for this elimination. I think, perhaps, if I am permitted to run through the charts before further questions are submitted I may anticipate many of the questions which otherwise might be asked.

The first proposition which I submit and which I think stands beyond controversy is that the automobile no longer can be classed as a luxury. It must be classed as a necessity.

The second proposition I want to submit is that motor vehicles already are the most heavily burdened tax patriots in the country. Indeed, they are now the essential source of substantial State revenues in every State in the Union and are largely looked upon as, and in my judgment ought to be allowed to be, the tax target of the States, if a tax target at all, instead of the Nation's.

But I want to point out to what extent the automobile vehicle already is paying its share and infinitely more than its share of the cost of Government. The motor-vehicle taxes in 1931—I am calling the attention of the Senate to the next chart now—totaled $1,022,000,000. In gasoline taxes the motor vehicles paid, in 1931, $524,000,000; in license fees, $348,000,000; in personal property and municipal taxes, $150,000,000; a total of $1,027,000,000 in taxes.

Motor vehicles pay nearly 10 per cent of all taxes collected in this land. On the chart is the line showing the motor taxes and the comparison. All motor taxes equal one-fourth of Federal expenditures. The chart shows also the comparison with the expenditures of Federal Government.

The pending bill contemplates adding other burdens on top of this superlative burden which the traffic already bears. I say again there is no complaint from the gentlemen who have come to Washington and appeared before the committees of both Houses as against any tax which is universal in its application and respects all alike; but special levies on top of everything else are deemed to be not only insufferable but, as I shall presently indicate, it is believed to be a definite bar upon the most hopeful opportunity which there is in the present economic situation for a restimulation of general trade.

In looking at the chart which indicates the tremendous burden already carried by the motor vehicles and realizing to what an extent this contribution is being made to the States and local subdivisions of government, I submit that it might be well to remember the advice of the old adage, that it is possible to kill the goose that lays the golden egg or, changing the simile, that it is possible to put the last straw upon the camel's back which makes it break.

Here is another chart bearing upon the same subject to which I have just adverted, but showing progressively how these assessments from year to year have been rising, rising, rising. I pass the chart with the observation that inevitably there is a top where this thing will blow up.

Before coming to the next chart, I want to refer to another exhibit bearing upon the question of multiplicity of levies, because, after all, when an industry confronts a multiplicity of levies it inevitably confronts embarrassment and discouragement and difficulty. Here is a typical sample bearing upon the multiplicity of motor levies. The city of Mobile, Ala., is offered as an example. This automobile in Mobile, Ala., pays $11.28 registration fee, $7.80 personal-property tax, $31.15 State gasoline tax, $6.23 city gasoline tax, $9.35 county gas tax, a total of $65.78. We are proposing in the terms of this bill to manufacture one more crushing levy to be added to this total.

I want to use one more card before I leave that phase of the subject to show what these taxes mean to the individual owner of the car. I am calling attention now simply to the bottom exhibit upon this card. Senators will note the average tax for motor vehicle in 1931 was $39.74. The total tax is 20.1 per cent. The percentage of average tax paid throughout the average life of the vehicle, namely, seven years, is 140.7 per cent of its value.

In other words, the average automotive car owner in the course of seven years, under the existing automobile tax levies of the Nation, pays almost one and a half times the cost of his car in taxes. That fact has a bearing upon the contention that there is a point at which this burden can not be extended.

The third proposition, Mr. President, is what does all this mean to labor and employment? These are factors involving unavoidable challenge in this hour of economic perplexity. Here is an industry with a potential employment of 4,022,000 men. Nine and a half per cent of all the gainfully employed workers in the United States are embraced within this classification. Those employed directly total 3,197,000. Here [indicating on chart] is the breakdown of that figure. I will not take the time of the Senate to read the details; the chart speaks for itself. Those employed directly number 825,000, and the total is 4,022,000.

The point is, Mr. President, in respect to this chart [indicating] that I am coming to prove that this is the key industry of the United States, speaking in terms of industry, if there is a key industry in the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Could the Senator have these tables inserted in the RECORD at some time? I think it would be valuable to have them printed in full.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should be very happy to act upon the Senator's suggestion. At the moment, for the RECORD, I will call attention to the fact that the employees in the motor-vehicle factories number 228,000; in parts factories, 119,000; in tire factories, 50,000; among dealers and salesmen, 205,000; supplies, accessories, tires and parts, dealers and salesmen, 95,000; garage and repair-shop employees, 537,000; professional chauffeurs, 380,000; professional truck drivers, 1,573,000; automobile financing and insurance and those connected with such lines, 10,000; gasoline refining and retailing, 350,000; iron and steel workers, 40,000; copper, lead, tin, nickel, and aluminum workers, 10,000; railroad workers, 60,000; lumber and wood workers, 6,000; electric power and coal workers, 4,000; highway workers, 325,000; miscellaneous others, 30,000. No possible tax could be devised which would attack and hamper more elements of trade and employment.

Mr. President, again let me say that the point I am undertaking to make and which is still further emphasized by this larger chart [indicating] is that this is the key industry of the United States.

Here [indicating] is a map of the United States showing every State in the Union. The letters in red upon each State indicate the commodities from each State which are purchased and used in the manufacture of automobiles. The letter "E" in each State represents direct employment in the auto industry; the letter "S" indicates the number of automobile retail stores; the letter "F" represents the number of automotive factories and gasoline refineries.

Mr. President, I challenge any Senator from any State in the Union to identify his commonwealth upon this map and fail to find upon it the clear, specific, unanswerable demonstration that his State has a specific and direct interest in the restimulation of the automotive trade of the United States.

I invite the attention of every Senator to the fact that this industry breaks down into subactivities which touch thousands of wage earners in every State in the Union; I invite the attention of every Senator to the fact that in his State, without exception, there are basic commodities which are purchased and brought into the production of motor cars and motor vehicles. As a whole and in sum total, Mr. President, this is to-day the key industry of the United States.

This key industry, Mr. President, in the last six months has demonstrated more economic bravery than has any other industry in this land. I think Senators are familiar with the fact that during the spring sales season the automotive industry undertook to proceed regardless of profit primarily for the purpose of recreating employment, upon plans for a courageous assault upon the retail markets of the United States this year. In undertaking to proceed with that program they recurred to publicity plans upon a broad and ambitious scale, the first publicity of this sort that has been in any degree reminiscent of normal economic times in this country. They proceeded in this campaign upon the basis of the lowest possible production cost which could be attained and the lowest possible price at which the cars could be offered to the country.

The spokesman for them, Mr. President, before the Senate Finance Committee, declared that the possibility of reducing costs 10 cents upon a car was the cause of a major conference in order to achieve it; in other words, the whole point and effort of the automotive adventure during this dark spring season has been to furnish the power which should reinspire and restimulate American industry and American business, not only with courage but with orders. They have proceeded upon that ambitious adventure, Mr. President, with a bravery that is to their everlasting credit, and with an optimism and a courage which deserve something better from the American Congress than not only a discrimination but an actual impairment of the possibility of achieving the thing so essential to American commerce in every State in this Union. They have sought orders, not profits. They seek to provide employment, not dividends.

It is upon that basis, Mr. President, fundamentally, that I submit to the Senate that it is not sound business for the Congress, itself in a situation of this character, to pick out the one business that offers any hope to America and to crucify it with a special discriminatory tax which, in the judgment of those who deal with this subject intimately, puts an additional and final load upon the industry which it can not endure if it is to carry on.

Not only that, but here is a sixth proposition, and I dismiss it in two or three sentences. The tax on replacement parts which is carried in this amendment is a tax on misfortune; it is a tax upon accident; it is a tax which invites the sacrifice of safety; it becomes veritably a tax on human life. To state the case is to prove it.

Another proposition: The automobile revenue as estimated by the Treasury is capable of being proven to have been more alluring—I do not say deliberately so—but more alluring than reliable. The fact that appears to me is that the figures submitted to the Senate as a justification for this levy have been at an altitude calculated better to "sell" the scheme to the Senate than to produce revenue for the Treasury; and I say that advisedly.

Mr. President, the estimate of revenue on the basis of the Senate Finance Committee bill is supposed to be a total of $73,000,000. If production in 1932 shall equal that of 1931—and it will be a miracle if it does—the total revenue from this tax will be not $73,000,000 but $54,000,000.

Again, Mr. President—and I am now using the figures of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce—estimated upon the basis of production for the first quarter of 1932, the product of this tax instead of being $73,000,000 will be $30,000,000, of which $23,000,000 will come from automobiles, $3,000,000 from trucks, and three and a fraction million dollars from parts.

Mr. President, the possibilities of income from this source cease to be so attractive when they are figured upon the cold realities of the situation, and I submit that it is a poor business bargain for us to single out, for the sake of $30,000,000 instead of $73,000,000, the one industry in America which gives any hope of resurgent trade and the restimulation of economic life; to single it out not only for a special and discriminatory and fatal burden but for actual hobbles to hold it back in its race for trade.

Mr. President, I wish to say in conclusion that there are ample alternative methods for obtaining either the $30,000,000, which is the proceeds of this tax based upon current production, or the $73,000,000 which is the Treasury estimate. There are ample alternative sources from which to get either one of those sums, but there is no source to which Congress may turn for either of them to less advantage than is indicated in the plan and chart of this bill in respect to this industry. Any other tax can have a better defense than this particular tax under these particular circumstances and in these particular times, when, as I have demonstrated time and again, the best economic hope of the country is in the restimulation of trade which can be touched by this key industry, and which this industry has dared to plan upon precipitating.

So I say, in conclusion, the motor industry is ready to carry its share of any uniform load, and it has never asked for any favor otherwise. It wants no favors. It simply wants an even chance at the consumer's dollar. It wants an even chance to give the consumer maximum value. It wants an even chance to put and keep 4,000,000 men at work. It wants an even chance to stimulate all these other industries which are related to and dependent on it. It wants an even chance to survive, and to help America to survive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have submitted a substitute. I think perhaps the Chair is informed of that fact. I understand that the substitute can not be voted upon until the amendment is perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator proposed a substitute?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have proposed a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the clerk state the substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator submit his substitute at this time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did submit my substitute at the opening of my observations. May I say, in view of the parliamentary situation, that my hope would be, first, that the committee amendment shall be defeated, because the committee amendment is seeking still further to increase this discrimination and burden. Therefore, on the first vote, which is a vote upon the committee amendment, I shall hope that the committee amendment will be defeated. Then, whether defeated or carried, when the Chair submits my substitute, which strikes out the entire section, I shall, of course, hope and pray that that may carry.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee amendment is supposed to provide a revenue of $73,000,000, as stated by the Senator from Michigan. That is the estimate of the Treasury Department. That is on the rates recommended by the Senate committee. On the rates as passed by the House, the revenue would be $56,000,000. Those rates are as follows:

On automobile truck chassis and automobile truck bodies, including in both cases parts or accessories therefor sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof, the House provided a rate of 2 per cent. The Senate committee recommended 3 per cent.

On other automobile chassis and bodies and motor cycles, the House provided a rate of 3 per cent. The Senate committee amended that by striking out 3 per cent and inserting 4 per cent.

On parts and accessories the House provided a rate of 1 per cent, and the Senate committee provided a rate of 3 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair state to the Senator from Utah that the first motion to strike out relates to paragraph (a) of section 602.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but I was giving the whole picture, because the Senator from Michigan referred to the amount of revenue that would be raised by the Senate committee provisions covering paragraphs (a), (b), and (c); and in what I stated I covered the revenue from all three of the paragraphs.

It is true, Mr. President, that the automobile truck chassis would provide at 3 per cent $44,000,000, and at 4 per cent $58,000,000. There is not a tax imposed in this whole bill but that there are objections to—not one.

The committee was compelled to do the best it could, and select industries, first, from which we could get the revenue; second, to do as little harm as possible to the business of the country by imposing taxes that amount to a billion dollars. That is what we had to do; and I sometimes feel that under the provisions of this bill, we will not raise the billion dollars. If business continues as it is to-day, without any increase whatever, I feel positive that under the provisions of the Senate committee amendments to the bill we can not raise that amount of money.

It is true that the industry we are taxing at this time will pay a considerable part of the tax that we intend to collect from the people. Your committee thought there is no industry in the United States that is in better condition to pay than the automobile industry. Your committee did not select it because they had any ill-will toward the manufacturers of automobiles. They did not select that industry because of the fact that its product is used by hundreds of thousands of American citizens. Your committee had to select sources where the tax could be collected; and I think myself that the amendments that have been made by the Senate committee meet the situation as it exists in the United States as well as any changes designed to raise a billion dollars that it was possible to make.

God knows I wish we did not have to raise any additional taxes, whether from the automobile or from all of the many sources covered by taxes imposed in this bill; but in order to meet the obligations of the Government that must be done. The Budget can not be balanced unless we hurt some industries and all of the industries in the United States.

I know that this is a burdensome tax. I know that it is a tax that reaches more of the people directly than any other tax, perhaps, that there is in the bill; but we can not raise the requisite amount of money unless we do reach them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. We have all been pretty well exhausted fighting this tariff bill. That is true of several of us, including the Senator himself.

I have talked to several Senators, and I want to make a suggestion. A few of us would like to get our wits together on this matter, and I suggest that we recess to-night before trying to vote on this automobile tax and these excise taxes, and come back to-morrow morning as early as the Senator sees fit. I know there are a number of Senators that I want to confer with since we have gotten through with the tariff items, concerning which we were all in doubt as to whether or not we were going to be able to pass them. They involved considerable revenue, and it was almost impossible to make calculations until we got through those tariff items.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I assure the Senator right now that notwithstanding the tariff taxes, and taking into consideration what we anticipate collecting from them, we will not have a dollar of revenue more than is necessary to balance the Budget. I say again that it is my opinion that under the provisions of the bill as it is, if every item remains in the bill and we collect the anticipated amount from the tariff rates, I think we will fall short of the amount that is necessary.

I know the state of business throughout the country. I know that it has not improved, and it must improve if we are going to collect enough money under the provisions of this bill to raise a billion dollars and over. If I had my way, or in other words, if I were framing the bill, I would try in every possible way to avoid imposing a good many taxes that are imposed. This, of course, seems like a large amount, and it is a large amount, because the automobile industry is the greatest industry in the United States to-day.

I agree with all that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has said in regard to the volume of business carried on by the manufacturers of automobiles in this country. I know that the business reaches into every nook and corner of the United States. There is hardly a family in the United States that is not involved in some way; but if we are to raise the necessary money to meet the Budget, we shall have to go into almost every home. We shall have to hit every individual in the United States. We can not pick out one industry and say that it shall pay all the taxes. It is an impossibility.

As far as the business is concerned for this year in which we expect to collect our taxes, I may be wrong, but I have a feeling that we are going to be greatly disappointed. I think when the tax returns come to light, and the figures are shown, there will be a greater loss than is anticipated even by the Treasury Department.

I know of no one who could have made a better plea than did the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in behalf of the automobile business. I know that all he has said about the real value of the industry to America is true, and more, too.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator if he considers higher income taxes and estate taxes a burden on the industry of the country?

Mr. SMOOT. Every tax is a burden on the industry of the country.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then a tax that would be paid by the mass of the common people, reducing their buying power, would also be a burden on industry, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Every tax that is imposed in any form falls in one degree or another upon industry.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is right. Why, then, do we have to worry our heads about balancing the Budget in time of emergency? Why can we not balance the Budget on the credit, the taxing power of the Nation in the future, when we know there will be some recovery?

Mr. SMOOT. The safest way for any government to do is to live within its income, especially where it is necessary to impose upon every individual a tax directly concerned with his own personal business.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is not that an indication that the recipients of big incomes would like now, in this time of stress, to transfer the tax over onto the recipients of the little ones?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; they can not do that.

Mr. BROOKHART. And then be relieved from their burden when prosperity returns?

Mr. SMOOT. They can not do it. Under the present system of taxation how many persons does the Senator think pay income taxes to the Government of the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. I know how many there are in Iowa—yes, and in the United States, too. There are about two and a half million.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. There are just a little over 2,000,000 income-tax payers in the United States to-day. That is all there are. I wish we were in a position where we did not have to increase that number, but we shall have to do so.

Mr. BROOKHART. They are the ones who get all the incomes, and that is why they have to pay it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; they do not. I do not want to go into an explanation as to why they do not. There is no necessity for that at this time.

I do not know what more I could say to the Senate than what I have said. It is up to this body, on this vote, it seems to me, to decide as to whether we are to raise sufficient money to meet the deficit of our Government, which we know is going to exist.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Every Senator would like to vote against this tax. If we defeat the tax, what is the recourse?

Mr. SMOOT. I have already explained that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator from Ohio was here the other day when I disclosed a way of balancing the Budget without this tax. He certainly is not asking the question now as to how we could raise the money if we did not impose this tax.

Mr. FESS. I was here, but I was not impressed with what the Senator suggested.

Mr. COUZENS. It was a way, whether the Senator was impressed with it or not. I did not expect the Senator to be impressed.

Mr. FESS. We can not collect income tax when there is no income.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a certainty.

Mr. COUZENS. The statement that there is no income is almost absurd.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator meant relatively. The Senator did not mean that nobody would pay an income tax.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I understand the situation of the Senator from Michigan. I am asking the chairman of the committee, if we defeat this, what is the recourse? It certainly is not in taxing high incomes. That does not impress me.

Mr. SMOOT. If we defeat this item, which we anticipate will really bring the revenue, I do not know where we will get an amount of money equal to what we would collect under this provision. Of course, there is one way, and I tried that in 1922, when a tax bill was before us, and I think I got 22 votes.

Mr. FESS. That is, the sales tax?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the general sales tax.

Mr. FESS. Is that feasible?

Mr. SMOOT. It is feasible; yes.

Mr. FESS. Why not try it?

Mr. SMOOT. Because there are not votes enough in the Senate to carry it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I was called from the Chamber and did not hear the argument on this proposed amendment. As I understand it, the proposition is to strike out the committee amendment providing a tax of 3 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the pending amendment is to strike out paragraph (a) entirely, so that there will be no tax on automobiles, truck chassis, or automobile truck bodies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is mistaken about that. The first vote will be on the committee amendment on page 246, line 23. The Senator from Michigan will then make his motion to strike out paragraph (a), after the vote is taken on the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I went to the object of the amendment directly. The object of it is to strike out all of the tax on automobiles.

Mr. COPELAND. In spite of what the object may be, I would like to know the effect of the various steps. As I understand it, the first motion is to reject the committee amendment. Is that right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing or disagreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah this question. Suppose we reject the committee amendment. We would then go back to the 2 per cent tax, would we not? If so, what would be the estimated loss in revenue, if we were to reduce the tax from 3 per cent to 2 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be $14,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is quite confident that this is a better tax than the tax on wort?

Mr. SMOOT. One article is used by everybody, and wort is used for making beer. They can get along without that.

Mr. COPELAND. Do I understand the Senator to say that wort is used by everybody?

Mr. SMOOT. Just the reverse.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, I see; I misunderstood the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure the Senator was thinking as I stated it, however.

Mr. COPELAND. As I understand the Senator, if we reject the committee amendment, the effect would be to reduce the possible income from this item by $14,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. COPELAND. If we were to reject the entire paragraph, it would mean the loss of three times fourteen, or $42,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it would mean a loss of $73,000,000 in the whole automobile tax.

Mr. COPELAND. I mean just as to paragraph (a).

Mr. SMOOT. If that were rejected, it would mean a loss of $58,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, on the first vote we would have to choose as to whether we would retain in the bill $14,000,000 which we would lose by going back to the House rate?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. If the Senate committee amendment is not agreed to, we will lose $14,000,000. If, then, the paragraph were stricken out, we would lose $58,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. This paragraph (a) relates wholly to trucks, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It covers "automobile truck chassis and automobile truck bodies."

Mr. COPELAND. I am very serious about this, because I want to know the effect of the proposed amendment. If paragraph (b) is stricken from the bill, that will include the Lincolns and the Pierce-Arrows, and the high-grade cars, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. I stated the amount to be collected on the passenger cars. The rate on those was 3 per cent in the bill as it passed the House and is 4 per cent in the Senate committee bill. That is where the difference of $14,000,000 comes.

Then under the 2 per cent rate—that is, on trucks—the estimated revenue is $4,000,000 under the 2 per cent rate and under the 3 per cent rate it would amount to $6,000,000, or a difference of $2,000,000. Under the 1 per cent rate the amount would be $8,000,000 under the House provision, and it would be $9,000,000 under the Senate committee bill. That is, on tires, tubes, and so on.

Mr. COPELAND. I find myself confused, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. On passenger cars the House fixed a rate of 3 per cent, the Senate committee 4 per cent, and the difference between the revenue estimated under the 3 per cent and the 4 per cent rate is $14,000,000.

The next is trucks. The rate in the House was fixed at 2 per cent; in the Senate committee bill at 3 per cent. The difference is estimated to be $2,000,000.

On parts and accessories the House fixed a rate of 1 per cent, under which it is estimated we would collect $8,000,000, and the revenue estimated under the Senate committee amendment is $9,000,000, or a difference of $1,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. To face the amendment which is pending, if the 3 per cent suggested by the committee were rejected, we would go back to the House rate and the loss would be $2,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. If one of the Senate committee rates is picked for defeat, I suppose we will take all of them. In other words, under the House provisions, all three of them, we would collect $56,000,000, and under the Senate provisions we would collect $73,000,000. That means a difference of $17,000,000, taking all together.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not want to take them all together. I want to make a separation between the trucks and the pleasure cars. In my mind, at least, there is a great distinction between the trucks and the pleasure car.

Mr. SMOOT. The rate on the pleasure car is 4 per cent under the Senate committee bill, and on trucks 3 per cent, and on parts and accessories 2 per cent.

Mr. COPELAND. If we were to reject the Senate committee amendment providing for 3 per cent, in paragraph (a), and go back to the House text, our loss would be $2,000,000?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, on trucks; yes.

Mr. COPELAND. While, on the other hand, if we reject the Senate committee rate of 4 per cent, in paragraph (b), and accept the House rate, we will lose $14,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Fourteen million dollars.

Mr. COPELAND. So the matter that is pending now is the question of whether we will accept the Senate committee amendment of 3 per cent, or go back to the House rate of 2 per cent, and by so doing lose $2,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. On this particular amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to go all over what we covered to-day, but in view of what the Senator from Ohio just stated, that he did not know what substitute we could find in place of this tax, if we could eliminate it, I want to say a word.

My colleague pointed out a few moments ago that we would expect some $30,000,000 of tax from this item, based on the production of three months in 1932. If that is so, then this estimate of the Treasury of $73,000,000 is about $40,000,000 or more off.

While I am speaking of that, I may say that I am not going over the field my colleague covered, but I want to point out that the automotive industry this year has spent nearly as much as the entire tax would be in exploiting the business, in the form of advertising and exhibits. In other words, they have spent over $22,000,000 this year in trying to revive business. And now comes along the proposal to hobble the one great industry of the Nation with a tax which no other industry is to be hobbled with.

It is said there are no other sources of income we can tap except the motor industry, and the Senator from Utah made a very eloquent plea that this tax be retained, saying that he would not know where to go to raise the revenue if we did not impose this tax.

Obviously, we can not expect to obtain from the high income-tax brackets any substitute for these excise taxes. I am not claiming that. Whether the Senator from Ohio intended to imply that I would expect to raise the revenues from these high brackets or not, I do not know. If he did, he is in error.

I particularly pointed out the other day that the great hope of stable income this year was from the incomes in the low brackets; nevertheless, a guaranteed substantial income, not a speculative income. The incomes from two to ten thousand to twenty-five thousand dollars a year are not speculative incomes. They are the incomes from the great stable income groups of the country, and I want just for a moment to point out where the revenue could be raised.

For example, we estimate that over and above the rate now being collected the reinstatement of the 1918 rates would bring in $486,000,000. That is $331,000,000 more than the Finance Committee provides for.

Just consider the groups which would pay the taxes. From the group of those earning from one to two thousand dollars a year—and they would be the group of single men, without the married man's exemptions—we would get $40,000,000.

From incomes of from two to three thousand dollars we would get $49,000,000.

From incomes of three to five thousand we would get $99,000,000.

From incomes of from five to ten thousand we would get $109,000,000.

The largest group we would have would be of those earning from ten to twenty-five thousand dollars, from which we would get $174,960,000.

It will be seen, therefore, that it is in the medium-income groups that we find the reliable incomes from which we would get the revenue.

This tax, as my colleague pointed out, would come from the average man who earns $2,500 a year income and has a wife and two children. Under the 1918 rate he would have to pay $6 per year income tax. He is the man who purchases an automobile at an average price of $700 wholesale. That multiplied by 4 per cent would be $28. Under the income tax of 1918 he would pay $6, and under the proposed rate of 4 per cent on automobiles he would pay $28. So I ask where is the average man? Is he better off with the income tax of 1918 or is he better off with the 4 per cent sales tax on his automobile?

Mr. President, there is no reason for any of these sales taxes. The Budget can be balanced by eliminating all of the excise or sales taxes, with the possible exception of the tax on wort, and I understand that the chairman of the Finance Committee is not anxious to have that exempted. All of the rest of the sales taxes can be exempted. We can balance the Budget by reinstating the 1918 rates, cutting out all excise taxes, but imposing the gift tax, estate tax, postal increase, stock-transfer tax, admission tax above 45 cents, and the check tax. By that means we can absolutely balance the Budget and there will be no question of whether the Budget will be balanced by guessing at what the production of automobiles or radios will be. My colleague has very vividly pointed out that the estimate of $73,000,000 is twice too great based on the productivity of the motor industry during the first three months of 1932.

The committee itself recognizes, perhaps more impressively than I can state, the undesirability of picking out specific industries upon which to place a sales or excise tax. Just see what they eliminated. After having considered all of the different articles on which they were to place an excise tax, they raised the rate on automobiles and eliminated the others. For example, they eliminated the excise tax or sales tax on toilet preparations, furs, jewelry, yachts and motor boats, mechanical refrigerators, sporting goods, cameras, firearms, matches, candy, and soft drinks.

The Finance Committee itself recognized how unwise and uneconomic it was to place a sales tax on all of those commodities, and so they properly eliminated those items from the bill and made up the loss of revenue that was caused by their removal by adding a 1 per cent sales tax to the already existing 3 per cent tax on automobiles.

I do not think it is necessary to have any question raised, as it has been raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that there is no other means of securing the revenue.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am not at all averse to the position taken by the Senators from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS and Mr. VANDENBERG] with respect to these provisions of the bill. I am wedded to the idea advanced by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that we ought first to exhaust all reasonable opportunities for return from the income tax. The figures submitted by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] were very interesting, but it does seem to me that neither of the Senators has approached the real determinative question as to whether, if we are to have excise taxes, this particular tax should be imposed.

It is very interesting to me to know that our State of Montana, for instance, supplies a considerable amount of commodities to the automobile industry, and likewise other States throughout the Union. But, of course, we are interested in knowing what the result of this tax will be upon our supplies. Of course, if this tax would utterly destroy the automobile industry we would not be able to sell anything more to it. But it has not been established, at least, except by the statement of the junior Senator from Michigan, that the automobile industry would be destroyed. Indeed, I am concerned particularly to know to what extent the sale of automobiles would be hampered or destroyed by the imposition of this particular tax.

In other words, ought we not to have some information as to how prosperous this industry has been, what profits have been made during these periods of depression, or what losses they have sustained to indicate the burden that this particular tax would be. For instance, on an automobile that sells for $650, if the sales tax of 4 per cent were imposed, that would be $26, and the price exacted of the purchaser would be $676. How much of a loss would there be in the sale of automobiles if we increased the price from $650 to $676?

Take the case of the automobile that sells now for $1,000. If we impose a 4 per cent tax that would be $40, and the purchaser would be obliged to pay $1,040 instead of $1,000. How many quite willing to buy an automobile that costs $1,000 would decline to buy it if they had to pay $1,040? These seem to me to be the important questions for determining, if we are going to impose excise taxes, whether we ought to impose this particular tax on this particular industry.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course it would be absurd to say that this tax would destroy the automobile industry. On the other hand, it would be absurd for a layman, either like the Senator from Montana or myself, to undertake to estimate the handicap involved in such a tax. We can only go to those who are presumed to know. I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that perhaps 15 of the major automotive executives of the United States appeared in person before the Senate Finance Committee and submitted it as their considered conclusion that the assessment of this tax would provide just enough of a handicap and barrier to absolutely defeat their sales-campaign purpose for this spring, which they had built upon the absolute cost basis for the purpose of attempting to contribute a trade stimulus to their country and reopen their automobile factories.

Again, on the question of what their profits have been, I am not permitted to make public the schedule I have in my hand, although I shall be very happy to show it to the Senator, but I tell him that out of the 13 major companies of the country 11 show a distinct and substantial operating loss during the first three months of this year.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But let me inquire if the real evidence of that would not be the income-tax returns?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; and I would be quite happy to refer the Senator to those tax returns if he can get at them. I think the automotive industry, in the face of a lack of profits, relatively speaking, has been so much more patriotic than any other industry in the United States in going ahead in spite of its burdens, that I would be very happy to have the Senator check upon that statement in the income-tax figures, if he can do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The example to which the Senator has called attention showed that on an automobile costing $700 the added tax would make a price of $728. But the Senator must remember that this tax is not to be imposed upon the retail price that would be paid by the purchaser.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to be imposed upon the manufacturer's wholesale price.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; it is a wholesale price, I understand; but I was assuming those figures for purposes of illustration. I suppose very likely, the retail price being $700, the wholesale price would not be more than $550, or something like that.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I just used those figures for the purpose of illustration. I merely desire to say, of course, that the opinion of these gentlemen, expressed before the committee, without any facts upon which that opinion is based, is a rather unsafe basis upon which we ought to act.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Is there any way an estimate could be made of how much this tax would deter sales? How would the Senator go about it? If he were to ask the motor manufacturers to tell him how much the tax would deter sales, I do not think it would be humanly possible for them to give an answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I presume the next best answer would be the margin of profit there is in it.

Mr. COUZENS. Whether or not there is any margin of profit in the industry, it was obvious from the statement made that they would have to add it, as they have always added it, to the sale price of their car. In previous years when we have had such a tax they have not only advertised the wholesale price of the car, but have advertised "plus Federal tax of so much," and that in itself would be a deterrent on the sale.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the case I stated, it would be a deterrent to the extent of $40.

Mr. COUZENS. There is another matter I want to emphasize. The president of one of the large companies pointed out to me very vividly the psychology of picking out this industry as a luxury. The president of this company said they had just produced a new car costing about $1,700. If I remember correctly, he said they had demonstrated that car to 2,000 people through their sales agencies and they had closed practically no sales because everybody said, "It is a brand-new car and shiny; it is a luxury, and I guess I had better not be seen driving it now because of the effect it has upon those who are in distress." Not only is the tax involved but the psychology of picking out of all the industries in the United States this one industry and saying, "We will place a tax on it because it is a luxury," has a bad psychological effect.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Bearing upon the question of whether there is a sales resistance as a result of taxation, let me invite the attention of the Senator to a chart showing the States with high gasoline taxes. Ten of them are set forth. The average decrease in automobile registration in those 10 States for last year is 9.7 per cent, compared with the average national decrease of 2.8 per cent. On the chart is shown likewise the spread in States with a high gasoline tax. There are also shown 10 comparable States with a low gasoline tax. The average decrease in those 10 States is 0.8 per cent, as compared with 2.8 per cent, the national average. For whatever it is worth, I suggest that it bears upon the question of the sales resistance which the higher gasoline taxation provides.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There must be many other factors inducing caution in investment in automobiles in those States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If it is just a coincidence, it is a coincidence in 20 States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can not for the life of me see why the manufacturers of automobiles are the ones to complain. When one goes into a salesroom in New York to buy a car the price that is quoted to him is the price of the car in Detroit or at the place of manufacture. He has to pay the freight, he has to pay the charges of delivery, and I doubt exceedingly if the question of a small tax on a pleasure car would make any difference in the sale of that car. However, when it comes to the trucks, which are used by farmers and the delivery men, which, in fact, are a part of their business, I should like to see the price as low as possible. I can not see why the committee did not classify trucks and pleasure cars, too, in relation to value. The man who can afford to buy a Lincoln can afford to pay very much higher taxes proportionately than one who is likely to buy a Ford, although I know a very rich man now in sight of my eyes who rides in a Ford.

However, Mr. President, if I might use a much overworked modern term, I think it is "all bunk" to talk about the effect of this tax upon the manufacture of automobiles. I do not believe a word of it, in spite of the eloquence of those who advocate the idea. We must have revenue from some source; and, therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am going to vote for the tax on the pleasure car and against the tax on the truck.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Connally	Hatfield	McNary
Bailey	Coolidge	Hayden	Moses
Bankhead	Copeland	Hebert	Neely
Barbour	Couzens	Howell	Norbeck
Barkley	Davis	Hull	Norris
Bingham	Dickinson	Johnson	Nye
Blaine	Dill	Jones	Oddie
Borah	Fess	Kean	Reed
Brookhart	Frazier	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Broussard	George	King	Schall
Bulkley	Glass	La Follette	Sheppard
Bulow	Gore	Lewis	Shipstead
Byrnes	Hale	Logan	Shortridge
Capper	Harrison	Long	Smith
Cohen	Hastings	McGill	Smoot

Steiwer	Trammell	Wagner	Watson
Thomas, Idaho	Tydings	Walsh, Mass.	Wheeler
Thomas, Okla.	Vandenberg	Walsh, Mont.	White
Townsend

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me make it plain, inasmuch as the parliamentary situation has become somewhat involved, that the roll is about to be called on the committee amendment increasing the automobile tax on trucks.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, when the pending bill was reported to the Senate there was ample reason for adopting the House rates on trucks and automobile accessories instead of the rates recommended by the committee. The reasons which then existed for a reduction of those rates have been intensified on account of the action of a majority of the Senate in imposing a tariff of 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oil and 2½ cents a gallon on gasoline. On account of this additional burden, which a majority of the Senate has imposed upon the users of automobiles and on machinery requiring lubricating oils in their operation, amounting approximately to half a billion dollars, if the scheme operates as hoped for, no doubt, by its proponents, there is now double the reason why we should strike from this bill the tariff of 3 per cent upon automobile trucks and accessories, and also when we reach the amendment we should eliminate from the bill the tax of 4 per cent upon automobiles, as recommended by the committee.

Throughout the entire country—and I speak with more definite knowledge in regard to my own State—automobiles have for a number of years become the prey of those who find it necessary to provide for additional revenue. Every time a State gets into desperate straights for additional revenue it seems the first move is to turn toward the imposition of an additional tax upon gasoline and upon automobile license tags. In my State we have to-day a tax of 7 cents per gallon upon gasoline, and we have very high license taxes and charges for automobile tags. The rate of tax upon accessories has also been increased. The imposition of an additional tax by Congress will inflict upon the owners of automobiles a burden which will be almost unbearable. I very much hope that some other source for raising revenue may be found rather than singling out and discriminating against the automobile. I hope the Senate will first adopt the House rate and later on strike the tax entirely from this measure.

I am not speaking particularly for the industry; I am speaking for the users of automobiles. The Senators from Michigan speak for the industry. They have been pleading for it with great ability, except when the question arose of imposing a tax of 2½ cents on gasoline. I do not imagine that will be very conducive to the success of the automobile industry; I do not imagine that will assist very materially in keeping millions at work in the automobile factories; I do not imagine it will very greatly intensify the sales of automobiles; but I am sure that the Senators from Michigan are very capable of representing and speaking in behalf of the automobile industry.

My plea is more for those who use automobiles, which have become practically a necessity in this country. Certainly we know that trucks are a necessity to the farmers. So I hope that the Senate will first reject the Senate committee amendment, and then I shall be very much pleased to cooperate in an effort entirely to wipe out the tax on trucks and automobile accessories.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, as is well known, I have an amendment pending which will more than provide for the increased revenue proposed by the Senate committee. Because it was not supposed that the amendment would come up to-night, there are several Senators absent, some of whom would vote against it and some of whom would vote for it.

I shall vote against the committee amendment on this particular item in the hope that it may be defeated and that the money thereby lost to the revenue may later be provided by a tax which would be taken not from the pockets of honest taxpayers engaged in legitimate business but from the pockets of those engaged in illegitimate business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KING. Assuming that the Senator's amendment which, as I understand, relates to beer, is not adopted—and I think I can prophesy that it will not receive a majority vote of the Senate—and the tax on automobiles is stricken out, would the Senator, then, favor a sales tax? It is obvious, if all these excise taxes are eliminated from the bill, that we will have to resort to a sales tax or some other plan in order to obtain the revenue provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Before that happens I hope the Senate will realize that there is one source from which we may derive $375,000,000 or possibly $450,000,000, which will be taken not from the pockets of honest business but the profits of illegal industry. The Senate has already, by unanimous vote, agreed to attempt to take some $90,000,000 from the profits of illegal industry by placing a tax of 15 cents a gallon on brewer's wort, which is used for nothing else than making illegal beer.

Mr. President, while it is perfectly proper that they should attempt to reduce the profits of the alley brewers by that much money—it is expected to raise the sum of $90,000,000—since the Senate has unanimously voted to take $90,000,000 from the profits of the alley brewers, I can see no reason why the Senate should not be willing to take $375,000,000 from the profits of the bootleggers.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator kindly tell me how his leader at the other end of the Avenue stands with reference to this proposition? I am speaking of Mr. Hoover. Can the Senator tell me how the President stands with reference to this amendment?

I will say to the Senator that I have voted heretofore for a tax on beer; but I am a little hesitant about doing it again because of the fact that Governor Smith and the rest of these notable gentlemen have urged us to have a nonpartisan Government here in Washington and to stand by the administration; and I wanted to find out how Mr. Hoover stood before I voted at this time for this tax on beer.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; I realize perfectly well that the Senator from Montana would give a great deal to be able to follow the President in these matters; but the last time the matter was voted on upon the floor of the Senate there were 12 Republicans who voted for beer and 12 Democrats. Therefore it would seem to be fairly evenly divided; and I submit that it is not a partisan issue.

In the votes in the House on this subject the House has been very evenly divided. On the question of repeal there have been more Republicans voting for it than Democrats, and on the question yesterday on beer there were a few more Democrats than Republicans voting for it.

It is not a partisan issue; and, as the Senator very well knows, there have been no indications from the other end of the Avenue as to how we should vote on this subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not want to enter into any controversy with my good friend; but he knows that many of the provisions embodied in the bill were transmitted to the committee undoubtedly with the consent, if not by the direction, of the President. Secretary Mills—and it is no secret, or I would not mention it—suggested this proposition dealing with automobiles; and the Senate Committee on Finance reluctantly, I believe, voted to support it, believing that it was necessary in order to raise a requisite revenue, unless a sales tax was imposed or other excise taxes were levied. It was appreciated that resort to other sources of revenue might be more oppressive and obnoxious than the tax under consideration.

The Senator from Connecticut is a Republican. I am a Democrat. I voted very reluctantly to tax the automobile industry; but the House bill contained an excise tax on automobiles and trucks, and the administration urged that this particular provision under discussion be incorporated in the bill. I feel some moral obligation to stand by the committee; and I also believe it to be my duty to aid in giving to the country a reasonably, just, and fair revenue bill, and one that will receive the approval of the President.

I ask the Senator in the light of all the facts, if we eliminate this tax and other excise provisions in the bill, will we not be driven either to a sales tax or to the Senator's beer tax, the latter of which can not be passed, or to the proposition of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], which imposes higher income taxes, which will probably fall far short of furnishing the revenues required?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator has asked a great many riddles which no one can answer.

Mr. KING. They are not riddles.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say to him that he may remember, if he was in attendance at the committee meeting on the morning when the proposal was made, that the Senator from Connecticut stated that he was opposed to several of the proposals embodied in the Treasury proposition; but in order to get the matter out of the committee, where it had been sent back and forth like battledore and shuttlecock, I suggested that we accept the proposition as a whole as a compromise, even though there were matters in it which some of us could not support on the floor of the Senate. Therefore I suggested that we accept it as a whole, and I voted for it as a whole in order that it might come out on the floor of the Senate, where it could be discussed in the open.

Furthermore, on a subsequent occasion I voted against a reconsideration of any rates whatsoever in the committee; and I supposed that that vote had been a decisive vote. In fact, my recollection is that we twice voted not to have any reconsideration, the first time on the very day when the compromise was suggested, and the second time at the next meeting of the committee. Yet to-day, in the absence of several Members who did not know the matter had come up, the question of rates was reconsidered, and the rate on admissions to race tracks where horses and dogs race was lowered, the committee thereby reversing its former position, through what parliamentary situation I do not know. But I do not consider myself bound, and so stated at the time, to vote for any particular rate adopted in the committee that day.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator has given a correct recitation of some of the details that happened in the committee; and yet it does seem to me that we can not fully justify ourselves in voting to report out a bill containing these provisions and then attempt to destroy the measure.

Under those circumstances, having reported the bill, it does seem to me that we would be doing a disservice to ourselves and to the country if we spent the major part of our time trying to tear it down and then attempting to reconstruct on the floor of the Senate a measure, the proportions of which and the distortions of which no one could fully foresee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the Senator will bear me out when I claim that since the bill has been reported I have not consumed 10 minutes of the time of the Senate in discussing any of the measures which have been reported in the bill; and I can promise the Senate that to-morrow, when we are to take up this matter, I shall not take more than 10 minutes in discussing this amendment. It is not my purpose to delay action in the slightest degree.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one question before he sits down? I am not going to take up the time of the Senate.

Is the Senator opposed to the Senate committee amendment in order to create a deficit in the amount of revenue we are trying to raise here, so that he can then have a better argument for his beer amendment; or, is his opposition because he is fundamentally against the increase in this particular item?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the Senator from Mississippi was not in the Chamber when I stated that the reason I should vote against the automobile tax was in the hope that the Senate might at a later time, when we had an opportunity to vote upon it, supply the deficit in another way. I will say to the Senator that had the program gone through as was expected this afternoon and had the evening been spent upon the subject of coconut oil and copra and rubber, the matter might have come up to-morrow, and I should have offered my amendment before this amendment came to the Senate.

In view, however, of the fact that we had told several Senators that it would not come up, I asked that it be allowed to go until to-morrow; and I have already stated that the reason I was voting against it was in the hope that we might find another way of filling the deficit which would be encountered if we struck out this item. I stated that the way I proposed to fill it was by extending the Senate's vote the other day, when we voted to take $90,000,000 out of the pockets of the alley brewers, to taking $375,000,000 out of the pockets of the bootleggers by legitimatizing good, wholesome beer at a rate of 2.75 per cent alcohol by weight, which, as everyone agrees, is nonintoxicating. It is not the kind of beer that some people would like to buy; but, at any rate——

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator has answered the question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think I have the floor. The Senator interrupted me; and I shall hold the floor until I have finished what I have to say.

Mr. HARRISON. I will sit down, then, because I know it is going to be a long time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I had finished what I intended to say, but the Senator brought me to my feet again. If the Senator desires me to go on now, I am perfectly willing to go on; but I had taken my seat.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator ask me a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not ask the Senator any question.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to the Senator going on.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; then I will proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. I was asking this question in perfect good faith, and the Senator has answered it. I thought that was his reason for opposing this particular amendment. I did not believe he had any fundamental objections to it; but I thought it was for the reason, may I say to the Senator, if he will permit me——

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; and if the motion of the Senator from Michigan carries, I presume the Senator from Mississippi, in accordance with his usual practice, will move to reconsider, in order that the whole thing may be rehashed at a later date; and if at that time the motion to legalize the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent beer has failed——

Mr. HARRISON. I will not move to reconsider it.

Mr. BINGHAM (continuing). I shall probably vote with him for the tax on automobiles; but at the present time I propose to vote against it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield the floor. I do not desire to take any more time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought that was the Senator's position, and that is the trouble about this whole situation.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] wants to get his beer proposition in the bill. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] wants to get his high income-tax proposition in the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], perhaps, or the Senator from some other State, wants to get his sales tax in the bill. These various elements are going to vote against the recommendations of the committee. If we eliminate these propositions, we are going to find ourselves in the same confused state that the House found itself in, which action was condemned by the country.

It seems to me the only way to have an orderly measure is to try to go through on these recommendations. All of these arguments were put before the Committee on Finance. Very distinguished gentlemen represented the automobile interest. The same beautiful chart was presented to us at that time. Just before we vote on this automobile matter, however, may I say to my colleagues on this side that this is an unusual thing.

In 1918 the tax on this industry was 5 per cent on automobiles, 3 per cent on trucks, and 5 per cent on accessories.

In 1921 the tax was 5 per cent on automobiles, 3 per cent on trucks, and 5 per cent on accessories.

In 1924 the tax was put at 5 per cent on automobiles, 3 per cent on trucks, and we reduced the tax on accessories to 2½ per cent.

In 1926 we reduced the tax on automobiles to 3 per cent, we took the tax off trucks, and we took it off accessories.

The tax was not removed from automobiles until 1928. Indeed, we are not now, in the Senate committee's recommendation, going as high as the Treasury recommended, because they recommended at that time 5 per cent, 3 per cent, and 2½ per cent, the 1924 rates. The committee have reported only 5, 3, and 2 per cent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is true that in the Finance Committee I voted against and did my best to strike from the bill a number of these special sales taxes which seemed to me to be grossly unfair.

I disapprove of this tax on automobiles and trucks, just as I disapprove of all the other special excise taxes in this bill; but the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is wrong if he thinks that I am going to vote against them. I am going to vote in favor of the committee's action right through this list, although I am glad to have this opportunity of saying now that I think the whole system is unfair; and I hope and believe that when we have gotten through perfecting it and going over the separate amendments, we will then be driven by the very logic of events to adopt a uniform manufacturers' tax at a low rate. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] expects to propose such an amendment. If he does propose it, I expect to support it.

Meantime, however, this country is faced with a situation that is infinitely more important than the details of any tax bill. If this tax on beer can not be adopted, if the very high income-tax rates urged by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] can not be adopted—and I do not think either of them can be adopted, either the beer tax or the high surtaxes—if they can not be, and if, contrary to my expectation, a sales tax that is uniform, bearing equally on all businesses, can not be adopted, then in order to balance the Budget we shall have to put on these special excises; and it is vastly more important to the United States that we should balance the Budget than that we should be fair to particular industries.

There will not be any industry left in the United States unless the Senate and the House have the courage to raise taxes to the point where the revenue will equal the spending we have authorized. There will not be any United States to save, there will not be any business left to be fair or unfair to unless we have the courage to balance the Budget, and that is much more important than the fairness of any single rate that is here.

For that reason, although I hope later to see a fair and uniform tax adopted, I expect, until that time comes, to vote to support the action of the committee in the matter of these special taxes, although in my heart I disapprove of every one of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I dislike to see Senators become excited about the balancing of the Budget and the place where we are going to levy more taxes. We have not exhausted the objects of taxation by any means. Of course, some of us thought we ought to tax big incomes, big inheritances, giving big exemptions, so that the men with millions and billions, with incomes of from a million to five million, would pay a portion of their large incomes to help the Government, which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just pictured in its distress, in its misery, and in its collapse, about to pass out. But we did not succeed in doing that.

I sympathize with the Senator from Michigan in his advocacy of an amendment for the relief of the automobile industry from taxation. I can see how those Senators who want to relieve the automobile industry from taxation feel. They have just united with other Senators in putting a tax on gasoline. That has a direct influence upon the automobile industry. The men who are making automobiles will be injured by that tax, and, of course, they naturally want to relieve the automobile industry of the tax, so they will be able to bear the loss of lessening sales caused by the increase in the price of gasoline and oil.

I feel like returning good for evil to the automobile people, who strenuously and successfully imposed upon the farmers of America a gasoline tax, which will interfere with their automobile occupations and activities, and interfere with the purchases of new automobiles. So I am going to vote against the committee, in order to let the automobile fellows off a little on their taxes, so they will not need to go to the poorhouse but can still live in luxury, and not sell quite as many automobiles to the farmers, who have to pay the additional tax upon gasoline.

That is not all, however. There are other sources of revenue. We all love to tax the farmer. We have demonstrated that. We have sources of income among the farming communities of this country that will make it unnecessary to tax beer, will make it unnecessary to tax automobiles, will make it unnecessary to tax big incomes, it will make it unnecessary to tax large inheritances. We are not "soaking" the rich, but we are going to "sock" the poor.

On the farms of this country there are millions of hogs, literally millions. Why not levy an excise tax on hogs? It would be a great tax raiser. We could get unlimited funds, and we could relieve the rich from taxation. A dollar a head on hogs would yield a great revenue.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did the Senator say dogs?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I would not tax dogs, because there are too many society women in the fashionable houses of this country who have dogs, and of course we must not tax them. [Laughter.] But a dollar a head on hogs would relieve us of our trouble, and it would put the burden upon the farmer, who is used to it. That is where we ought to go with our taxes.

I dislike to see this controversy between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Connecticut, frittering away valuable time in a discussion whether we should tax bootleggers or not, frittering away the valuable moments of the Senate in a discussion of whether we should levy a tax on beer. That is immaterial. We ought to give due consideration to the occupation and the business of racketeers. We ought not to ruin them. We have not done it very much lately. They are going along pretty much as they want to. They control large sections of the country, and some people think they do it very well. But we need not concern ourselves about burdens of taxation as long as we have such lucrative untaxed fields. If we can not get enough on hogs, let us tax cultivators or let us tax plows. There are millions of plows all over South Dakota doing nothing. Why not tax them and put them to some use? [Laughter.] There are harrows all over the West. Let us tax some of the harrows.

Mr. LONG. How about chickens?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, tax chickens if you want to, but if a tax were put on chickens, the farmer might increase the price of the chickens when he sells them, and that would not work, because we who live in the mansions eat chickens, and we must not tax ourselves. We must put the tax where it can not be passed on.

I think we could very well afford to lay aside this disagreement we have been hearing about taxing automobiles and wealth and business. Business would feel good if it were relieved of some of the taxes. They are threatening to take money out of business, and we would not want them to do that. They would consent to do business and make millions.

They would go right on making millions. Those engaged in business would still consent to operate at a profit where they could accumulate billions of dollars and make millions in net incomes if we would not tax them. So we should let the farmer bear the burden.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I take the liberty to propound a question to my learned friend from Nebraska, the eminent Senator, conscious of his discriminating intelligence in matters of agriculture and in the application of taxes. Might I not ask the Senator, since he conceives the thought of taxing the hogs of the country, what is his conception of taxing the asses of the city? [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not catch the Senator's question. Did he ask me a question? Will not the Senator please repeat the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announces that if there is further demonstration in the galleries the galleries will be cleared. The rules of the Senate must be obeyed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am sorry I awakened the risibilities of the audience to such a degree as to endanger their presence here. But my eminent friend from Nebraska says that the gentle interruption of the pleasurable laughter prevented him hearing my inquiry. My inquiry of the Senator was, announcing as a predicate——

Mr. NORRIS. As a what?

Mr. LEWIS. As a predicate that, as the Senator is so capable, as disclosed, in his distinguished wisdom as to the application of taxes in order to relieve the burdens he feels unconscionable, and having announced what he thought was an equitable policy, of taxing hogs of the country, I sought from the Senator his judgment as to adding to that the taxation of asses of the city.

Mr. NORRIS. What of the city?

Mr. LEWIS. It is evident that my eminent friend from Nebraska, being a good farmer, has not associated with the large cities enough to know what aggregates their population—the asses of the city.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, being a resident of one of the large cities, I suppose, has a good idea of what he means. I am not very familiar with it.

Mr. LEWIS. I regret to say, Mr. President, that in politics I have seen more display of that equine juris than of any other order in the large cities, when it comes to the question of the representatives of the respective political parties.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, of course, is more familiar with that than I am.

Mr. LEWIS. I live in Chicago, where a very large percentage of mankind may be observed, and I still insist that since the Senator chooses from the country one of its particular products as a possibility of taxation, I can not see why certain other products throughout our country ought to be exempt, in view of what I have seen of their conduct in political affairs in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course the Senator is more familiar with that than I am, whatever the thing is. I do not know myself what it is, but I presume it is something which lives in the city.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. I do not care to occupy the floor, but if rumors are true, there are a good many sons of wild asses in the West. I presume the Senator from Nebraska is not one of them, however. His ears did not seem to be long enough to catch the remark of the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in my judgment, one's ears would have to be much longer than the ears of the particular animal with which the Senator from Oklahoma appears to be familiar to hear what the Senator from Illinois said. It may be that my hearing is defective. When the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Oklahoma get to be as old, or within 50 years as old, as I am, it may be that their hearing also will be defective. I am not to blame for that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator's hearing may be defective, but all who hear him know his wisdom is not.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator and yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 246, line 23.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. May we have the amendment stated for the benefit of those who were not present when the roll call began?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 246, line 23, strike out "2 per cent" and insert "3 per cent," so as to read "automobile truck chassis and automobile truck bodies."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will continue the roll call.

The roll call was resumed.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). I desire to announce a pair on this particular vote between my colleague the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Were my colleague present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HULL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. NEELY (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SCHALL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. Were I permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], who is detained because of illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY]; and

The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—30

Ashurst	Gore	Lewis	Smoot
Barbour	Hale	McNary	Steiwer
Barkley	Harrison	Neely	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Hatfield	Pittman	Watson

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as we have already discussed the next amendment relating to automobiles, I should like to have a vote on the amendment at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator let us proceed, so we may vote on this particular item of the Senator from Michigan and settle it at this time? If we are not going to have a tax on automobiles, then we ought not to have it. If the sales-tax people and the beer people and the high income tax people want to join, let them do it now and kill the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I have asked that we may have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to say to the Senator and some of my Republican friends that this side of the aisle is not going to furnish any votes on this proposition with those on the other side of the aisle laying down on it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am just as much interested in it as is the Senator from Mississippi, and that is the reason why I think as long as the Senators are all here and the matter has been discussed we might have a vote on it. This is the amendment relating to trucks. Some Senators want to vote for a tax on trucks. Let us have the vote, and then perhaps Senators will support the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The junior Senator from Michigan proposes, on page 246, to strike out paragraph (a) of section 602, lines 20 to 25, both inclusive, as follows:

(a) Automobile truck chassis and automobile truck bodies (including in both cases parts or accessories therefor sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof), 2 per cent. A sale of an automobile truck shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be considered to be a sale of the chassis and of the body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST answered in the negative.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there is much confusion among Senators as to what we are voting on. May we have it stated by the Senator from Utah so we may know what we are voting on? I am not the only one confused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Senate be in order, and the clerk will state the amendment again.

The legislative clerk again stated the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH. Does the amendment apply just to trucks?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just to trucks.

Mr. SMITH. Or to trucks and accessories?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Truck chassis and truck bodies. The clerk will continue calling the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). I desire to make the same announcement with regard to my colleague the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who has a pair on this particular vote with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HULL (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NEELY (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when the name of Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained at home by reason of illness.

Mr. SCHALL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. Were I permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I am paired upon this vote with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I am informed that if he were present, he would vote as I propose to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM (when Mr. WALCOTT's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HASTINGS. I find that I can transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I make that transfer, and therefore am permitted to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]; and

The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—29

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote just taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred resolutions recently adopted by the Taxpayers' League of Pottawatomie County, Kans. They are brief, to the point, and to my mind outline a constructive and helpful program. I particularly approve the appeal for lower interest rates for the agricultural industry.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives from Kansas:

We, the Taxpayers' League of Pottawatomie County, Kans., being assembled at the call of our chairman, make the following resolutions for the purpose of showing to our legislators our attitude on certain problems which now confront our country.

1. We indorse the efforts of the farm groups now working in behalf of depressed agriculture and urge you, our representatives in the national legislative body, to cooperate with those groups and vote in favor of legislation sponsored by those groups.

2. We particularly urge you to vote in favor of any bill introduced in Congress the purpose of which is to lower or reduce the interest rates on farm loans made by the Federal Farm Loan Board or Federal land banks, affecting those made in the past and those to be made in the future, as interest now appears to be one of the largest items of expense from the standpoint of the farm owner.

Passed this 30th day of April, 1932, by the above-named body in session in the city of Westmoreland.

F. J. PRAGUE, President.

FRED M. BROWN, Secretary.

PETITION OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS

Mr. WAGNER presented the petition of the American Federation of Musicians, praying for a redress of grievances, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the PRESIDENT, the VICE PRESIDENT, and the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

Your petitioners, the American Federation of Musicians, an organization comprising 683 local unions, with a total membership of 140,000 citizens who are professional instrumental musicians dependent upon their employment as such for a living for themselves and their families, exercising an age-old right of English-speaking peoples expressly guaranteed to us by the first amendment, do hereby respectfully petition you, the chief representatives of our Government, for a redress of certain grievances that bear destructively upon us as a class, do injury to our people as a whole, and tend to bring disrespect for our Government. These grievous conditions are caused by:

1. The Navy Department's persistence in the unlawful practice of ordering or permitting United States Navy bands to be used by civilian individuals and organizations for their private purposes.

2. The Navy Department's unlawful practice of hiring our Government bands to private booking agents and tour conductors for the profitable exploitation and pecuniary benefit of those individuals.

3. The resort by radiobroadcasting to machine-made and reproduced "music" for the real living art.

I

There are 145 service bands (89 Army, 56 Navy), with a membership of some 4,000 enlisted men. Three or four years ago the War Department took measures to prevent the use of the Army bands to the injury of civilian musicians. But the Navy Department, despite our continual protests, steadfastly persists in its practice, to our great injury.

These 56 Navy bands are of course a part of the regular Navy, and their members are paid fair compensation out of the Public Treasury. Several of these bands are stationed in or near the District of Columbia, some on our ships, many at our various shore stations. Beginning many years ago, when our defense establishments were small, naval commandants made a practice of permitting Navy bands to furnish music at private functions, as to some extent did the Army. In 1908, and again in 1916, Congress undertook to prohibit such uses of service bands in competition with civilian musicians. The Army, for the past several years, has accorded the statute fair respect, but, as for the Navy, the legislation has made the situation worse, as that department has, in practice, regarded the legislation as a grant rather than a limitation of authority. At least, since 1921, the Navy Department and naval commandants have habitually ignored the spirit and intent of the law and have persisted in doing with the bands as they pleased.

Instances of misuse of these bands by the department are as numerous and varied as the requests of civilians deemed prominent enough to be thus favored. They include all classes of private entertainments of which music is usually a part; private balls, dinners, and card parties, dinners in honor of naval officers, who are invited to bring their bands along with them; cabaret, hotel, and amusement-park entertainments; automobile shows, horse shows, and flower shows; radio programs; dedications of hotels and radio stations; football and baseball celebrations; outings and other functions given by city clubs, rotary clubs, boards of trade, and chambers of commerce; meetings of lawyers and national advertisers; church affairs of one kind and another; Knights of Columbus balls and Masonic banquets; in short anything held or sponsored by those having sufficient influence to get a band. Only in a single instance known to us has the department ever failed to approve a commandant's order for the use of a Navy band on such occasions.

By such methods naval personnel are put into the service of a class of private personages who thus get their diversions, entertainment, and self-aggrandizement at the expense of the public; this to our injury, to the degradation of the enlisted men of the bands, and to the cheapening of the Government in the esteem of thoughtful citizens.

A bill (H. R. 5647) designed to redress this grievance and to keep naval bands within the scope of their naval duties was introduced December 14, 1931, but we have not yet been able to arrange to be heard by the committee. We submit that the bill merits the favorable consideration of the Congress, and we respectfully ask for the enactment of legislation that will prevent such misuses of Navy bands to our injury.

II

In addition to the above general abuses, Navy bands stationed in Washington are annually hired out to private booking agents, who send the bands on concert tours upon itineraries and to places selected by the booking agent as offering him the greatest profit. This is called "enabling the public to hear their own bands." The few localities that make the most generous arrangements with the booking agent, who for the purpose owns the band and uses it for his profitable exploitation, do get to hear a band maintained by the taxpayers, but the people of such localities pay the booking agent handsomely for the privilege. The Navy Department turns the band over to the booking agent and there stops, divesting itself of all further responsibility; it knows and cares nothing about the terms of the employment nor the prices charged the public, nor the amount of profit made by the booking agent, nor the division of the profits between booking agent and band leader, nor the share which the band leader passes on to the individual members of the band. The bands are placed by the booking agents in direct competition with civilian musicians. Congress has been prevailed upon to provide in sporadic legislation that during such tours members of the bands shall suffer no loss of pay and allowances, from which the department has deduced what it regards as full authority.

If it is the policy of Congress that the public is entitled to have service bands go on tour in order that at least some of the people may hear them (a policy which we do not oppose although doubting its wisdom), it would seem that Congress should provide appropriate means and sufficient funds to that end. If a naval band can be let to a private individual to be exploited by him for profit, then, with equal consistence and with equal dignity, a naval vessel with its crew might be let to a shipping firm as a freighter or to a wealthy citizen as a yacht, or a crack troop of cavalry might be hired out to a circus.

We respectfully ask that the hiring out of these bands to booking agents be stopped by appropriate legislation.

III

Radio and "canned-music" machines of one kind and another play a prominent part in making this an age of substitutes in which sham serves for the genuine here, there, nearly everywhere. Canned music, cheap, novel, and ingenious, but not music, is being put over, ever increasingly, at great cost to the public and with great gain to the exploiters. Canned music has its place but never where better can be had. If present progress in foisting it upon the public suffers no check, the time may come when we shall no more hear and no more feel real music, that art which is most generally appreciated and which most influences human conduct.

Music is as necessary to proper human development as food and clothing. It has far-reaching social consequences, contributing to personal happiness, good citizenship, enlightened civilization.

For radio purposes, the air is owned by the people, under absolute Federal control. Broadcasting stations and systems are but the people's permittees holding subject to the people's will as imposed by Congress. Broadcasting should serve the necessities, the greatest convenience, the highest interest, not of the few but of all the people, as such interest is determined by the most enlightened standards. Such is not the case now, nor is the tendency in that direction. Music constitutes about 75 per cent of all programs, but relatively few musicians are employed. A single band or orchestra is made to serve where many equally good could be employed and should be employed in the public interest. Recorded music, the ordinary kind and that which is specially manufactured for the purpose, and the various methods of reproductions, are largely taking the place of real music. Nor is this practice limited, as necessity or advisability may require, to small stations serving rural territories, but higher power stations serving large and urban sections devote a large part of their time, including evening hours, to programs of such reproduced music. Moreover, mechanical music devices, from the coin-operated machines to those of more extensive character, are in general use. The result of it all is that our people are denied the advantages of living music; music as an art is suffering; and musicians, denied the opportunities for earning a livelihood, are disappearing; all of which is permitted, even stimulated, by Federal statutes and Federal administration.

We respectfully ask that broadcasting methods be modified and changed in many material respects, including the use made of music, the principal component, so as better to serve the interests and advancement of our people as a whole and of American musicians.

IV

The plight of American musicians is pitiable and our people are being starved for want of music and its advantages which are rightfully theirs. To-day 72 per cent of the members of our federation are out of employment as musicians; many are endeavoring to find other work in fields already overcrowded and for which they are little suited, and, failing, become objects of charity. Only a few years ago America was fast becoming one of the greatest musical countries of the world; now all that is changed, and not solely nor in greater part because of the present depression, although the depression has borne particularly hard upon us. Even before the depression we were struggling against adversity. We did not share in the general prosperity of a few years ago. While others were prospering, tens of thousands of us were being displaced by the phonograph, the music machine of every kind and description. Then we were met by the disastrous introduction of sound in motion pictures, which alone displaced at one fell blow 23,000 American musicians. Moreover, until this very Congress, which a few months ago passed an effective remedial measure, we had to meet the competition of hordes of alien musicians, of the like of whom we had more than enough to supply every demand, brought here, despite the contract labor law, because they would accept terms and conditions of employment to which no American should be subjected; and the radio, as indicated, has operated to our great detriment and is employed, we think, contrary to the best interests of the American people. In addition to all this, our Government, as represented by the Navy Department, without justification or excuse but with callousness and cruelty, insists that it will continue to permit its bands to play for private individuals and organizations who have no right to be furnished music at public expense and who are abundantly able to supply themselves with such music as they may need. Our Government, by thus catering to the vanity and self-glorification of a few wealthy and influential citizens, cruelly takes food from the mouths of ourselves, our wives, and our helpless children.

We, your petitioners, do humbly pray for a redress of these painful grievances.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS,
By JOSEPH N. WEBER, President.

MUSCLE SHOALS—AMENDMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 15) to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of the Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, to authorize the letting of the Muscle Shoals properties under certain conditions, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 24, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, Merciful Father, that Thou dost always hold before us some beautiful ideal, some radiant light, some great height which can be attained by help divine. Thou dost not leave us alone to go wandering without chart or compass. O write the Beatitudes in our hearts, lest we lose their music and go fumbling at some broken string. O write the Decalogue on the tablets of our memories, and may it always attest the handwriting of the finger of God. By these may we always be beckoned away from the lower plains of life. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken great and precious promises, and none can ever destroy the covenant of the Ancient of Days. Meet us to-day with a blessing that falls like an angel's spirit from the upper places. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BEER TAX

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the so-called beer bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object to the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Texas, who led the fight for and against the bill, extending their remarks; but to throw it open to all Members of the House neither adds nor subtracts anything from the merits of the question. It has been settled for this session, and it is only incurring an expense that ought not to be placed on the taxpayers.

Mr. BLANTON. This is an important question that affects every Member here alike, and every Member ought to have the same right.

Mr. SNELL. I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the bill may extend their remarks.

Mr. SNELL. There will be nothing new added to what has already been said.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Just a minute—I had 10 minutes, and I gave away 9, 6 of which was given to the gentleman's side of the House. Now, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put one request at a time. What is the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, to-day the House of Representatives is afforded the second opportunity to vote on the universally discussed question of prohibition.

On March 14 of this year 187 Members of this House voted to submit to the people, by way of conventions, the question of continuing the eighteenth amendment in its present form. Unfortunately the vote was not sufficiently large to afford the people an opportunity they have never had to express their sentiments on this much-mooted question.

The vote to be taken here to-day will determine how many representatives of the people still support that "legislative lie," the Volstead Act. It will also serve as a medium of ascertaining how many men and women here are more concerned with the economic welfare of the country by levying nonnuisance taxes sufficient to support the Government and balance the Budget than they are concerned with the threats of the Anti-Saloon League and other minority groups.

It is unfortunate that the "discharge rule" under which my motion was made was not more closely scanned at the time of its adoption. In actual practice, however, its unfairness is apparent. I venture to say that 90 per cent of the membership of the House believe that the rule meant that if 145 Members signed a petition the bill would come before the House for consideration and discussed on its merits. Such is not the fact, however. A majority of all Members present is still necessary before the bill is actually before the House for consideration.

Therefore I appeal to all the Members of the House, whether they be wet or dry, to vote to discharge the committee so that this measure may be read to the House and considered by it. The bill has never had any consideration anywhere.

On March 2, 1932, the bill H. R. 10017 was introduced by me and on the same day referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I communicated by letter and personally with every member of that committee requesting a hearing. None was ever granted. After waiting about six weeks I lodged my petition on the desk. On May 14, 1932, the one hundred and forty-fifth signature was affixed to the petition.

Surely there is sufficient demand throughout this country from the people in every part to entitle them to a real consideration of the bill on its merits. A vote to consider the bill is not necessarily a "wet" vote any more than a vote to resubmit the eighteenth amendment is strictly a "wet" vote. On March 14 several Members who voted to discharge the Judiciary Committee from further consideration of the Beck-Linthicum resolution would not have voted for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; likewise the first vote to-day to consider my bill does not mean that every Member so voting would vote for the passage of the bill or would accept it in every detail.

I therefore submit to your fairness in approaching this vote, not to be frightened by the threats of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union or other similar organizations who have swarmed like "locusts" the House Office Building during the past few weeks, intimidating Members by saying "they" would interpret a vote to discharge as a "wet" vote. Every Member of this House knows that is not so.

During the nine years I have been a member of the Rules Committee countless times have I voted to report a rule for the consideration of a bill to the passage of which I was opposed and which I intended to oppose and vote against. I voted for the rule so as to afford the House an opportunity to pass on the merits of the measure.

Now, what would a real consideration of this bill disclose?

H. R. 10017 legalized the manufacture and sale of beer containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight. This is equivalent to 3.46 by volume or about seven times the one-half of 1 per cent limitation in the Volstead Act. To that extent it modifies the national prohibition act and no more. The percentage of 2.75 was unanimously adopted by the two "wet" groups in the House, because the lengthy hearings before the Judiciary Committee of the House in February, 1930, had demonstrated beyond further doubt that beer containing that percentage of alcohol was not intoxicating in fact. Furthermore, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the prohibition cases clearly indicated that Congress was within its rights in declaring such a percentage as nonintoxicating, as this bill does declare.

The bill provides that this beer shall be taxed at 3 cents per pint, or substantially $7.50 per barrel. The average consumption of beer in the United States between the years 1910 and 1918 was about 61,000,000 barrels per year. In 1914 is was 66,000,000 barrels. A continuance of that average consumption would yield revenue of substantially $500,000,000 per year, not to anticipate the increased consumption due to the continuance of the ban of the eighteenth amendment on other liquors. Some people estimate the possible consumption as high as 85,000,000 barrels. Will anyone here say the Government is not sorely pressed for this revenue? The United States of America stands to-day as the only nation in the world which does not utilize the liquor traffic as a revenue producer. England with one-third of our population derives nearly $700,000,000 a year from taxes on liquor. The chief item of sales-tax receipts in Canada is made up of taxes on liquor. In 1910 40 per cent of the revenue of the United States was derived from internal-revenue impositions on liquor. Contemplate that!

It was estimated when we considered the revenue bill at this session that the proposed "sales tax" would yield about $500,000,000 per year, although there would be the necessity of setting up an entirely new organization and machinery for its enforcement, the cost of which was indefinite. The collection of a tax on beer is nothing new in this country. Up to 1919 there was levied a tax of $1 per barrel. In 1919 this tax was raised to $6. The organization set up is still in existence in the Treasury Department. The tax is collected at the brewery, a comparatively small number of places of collection. You will recall that the "sales tax" was opposed on the grounds that it was a levy on every man, woman, and child in the United States, and especially on the poor; that it was an involuntary tax on necessities. Surely no one can say a tax on beer is similarly objectionable. It is a voluntary tax. It might be called a "luxury tax." No one need buy beer unless he so desires.

Mr. Speaker, in these days of a universal demand from the country that we levy the taxes necessary to balance the Budget, what fairer, less objectionable tax could be imposed than that suggested in this bill?

The practically universal demand that the saloon be forever abolished is answered by this bill. The saloon can not exist without draft beer, which requires the bar and all its appurtenances. Under this bill the beer can only be sold in bottles, not to be consumed on the premises where sold except in a "regularly established dining room of a hotel, restaurant, or duly incorporated club, with each member paying annual dues of not less than $10." It is anticipated that this beer would be sold in the "chain" stores and other stores and should retail at 10 cents a pint bottle including the tax.

The bill also puts the beer gangster and racketeer out of business by specifically prohibiting the issuance of any permit to any person convicted of a felony or who employs any convict on the premises. The gangster has thrived and multiplied on beer, not whisky. Take that source of revenue away from him and a long step will be taken in eliminating lawlessness and its accompanying heinous crimes, such as kidnaping.

H. R. 10017 completely protects those States which do not desire to permit the sale of this beer within their borders. Furthermore, the bill goes farther and protects the smallest hamlet or local subdivision of a State which desires by local option to prohibit the sale of beer. Why should a village in Texas, which can prohibit the sale of this beer within its boundaries, be concerned with its sale in a town in northern New York?

One of the most important features of the bill is contained in section 6, under the terms of which no grains or other materials can be imported for use in manufacture of this beer. Prior to prohibition large quantities of hops and grains were imported into this country for use in the manufacture of beer. It is estimated that under the terms of this bill an outlet will be afforded to our farmers to dispose of about 150,000,000 bushels of grain. Who will say that any similar aid has been granted the farmer, long since suffering by an engulfing surplus?

Mr. Speaker, to-day 8,000,000 of our citizens are without employment. That is our greatest problem. Will they ever be all employed in this age of machine production? Many deep thinkers believe they will not be unless some new industry be found to occupy them. By the enactment of prohibition we destroyed one of our largest industries.

It is estimated that the restoration of beer to the people will immediately cause the employment directly and indirectly of nearly 2,000,000 persons, including employees in breweries, wholesale and retail dealers, club, hotel, and restaurant employees, hops and barley growers, bottle and box makers, printers, truck drivers, railroad employees, and clerks. It is estimated, incidentally, that 80,000 freight cars will be needed to transport this beer. Hoarded capital will be released and a new investment opened up for stockholders.

In all the hearings before the Senate and House committees eminent physicians have testified that beer is a healthy food, when properly and scientifically made. Hundreds of millions of gallons of beer are being made annually in this country, according to the statistics published by our prohibition-enforcement officials. Practically all of it, however, is unaged "home-brew" or etherized with a count of about 95 bacteria, as compared with a count of 3 in scientifically brewed beer. Is subservience to the fanatical moralizing of an organized minority of our people more important than the health of millions of our citizens who demand the right to drink beer when and if they see fit?

Mr. Speaker, since 1929 our country has suffered the greatest business and employment depression in its history. Many people believe conditions have and are gradually becoming worse. In the highest places in Government and business statements have been made that a very large part of the plight in which we find ourselves is due to timidity and lack of confidence; that much of our condition is "psychological"; that some "spark" is necessary to start the engine running again. Not only I but countless people sincerely believe that the enactment of this bill and the legalizing of beer will do more to furnish this "spark" and restore this confidence than any measure yet suggested in Congress or elsewhere.

In all my activity in behalf of prohibition reform it has been my constant objective not to embarrass my colleagues. It would be a lasting regret to me if anything I might do in this connection were to result in any difficulty to any Member here. But my country comes ahead of moralizing or the demands of small organized groups. Who here will bankrupt their country to follow the pratings from pulpits? Very few, I am confident.

About a month ago when our distinguished Speaker took the floor and called upon the membership of this House to evidence their patriotism, every man and woman rose in their places.

Again, to-day I call on those who love their country, who desire to balance our Budget, who desire to answer the demands of an overwhelming majority of our people, who sincerely desire to relieve unemployment, to help the farmer, to release frozen capital, to restore confidence to our people—I call on them to bravely meet the issue and to vote for the consideration and the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not ask for a privilege that is not granted to all the others who are entitled to the same right.

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS IN STATUARY HALL

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the address of Josephus Daniels at the unveiling of the statue to Gov. Charles B. Aycock in Statuary Hall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of Hon. Josephus Daniels upon the occasion of the unveiling of the Aycock statue, presented by the State of North Carolina, in Statuary Hall, National Capitol, in Washington, D. C., on Friday, May 20, 1932.

CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK—DEMOCRAT

To this historic hall the Commonwealths have brought statues of their sun-crowned men. Most of them memorialize cherished sons who commanded listening Senates or who won distinction in war by courage beyond the call of duty or who pioneered in science or conquered new continents or discovered new ways to alleviate suffering or to prolong human life. North Carolina to-day presents to the Republic, which the wisdom and valor of its sons helped to establish, the statue of a beloved son whose whole life was spent in the confines of his State and whose genius was consecrated wholly to the service of the people among whom he was born. Although his labors were restricted to a single State, he proclaimed a social and economic philosophy that transcended geographical and political limitations and survived the complexities of changing years. It embodied the remedy for the evils of his own time and a potent solvent of the ills that stagger this Nation to-day. As he neared the end of life he expressed his faith in these words:

"Epual! That is the word! On that word I plant myself and my party—the equal right of every child born on earth to have the opportunity to burgeon out all that there is within him."

The man who professes that creed and dedicates himself to it would be noble and just however narrow his environment.

I dare to say in a time fraught with more of peril than he dreamed could ever confront this Nation that this truth and this alone will free us from the oppression of organized greed grown fat and arrogant and poisonous on privilege mulcted from the rulers of a patient people; and that will restore this Government to its primary function—the adequate protection and even-handed service of those for whose freedom and happiness it was created.

It was the genius of the man, and through it his supreme claim to immortality, that he pierced the fog of prejudice and despair of his day with a forward call, universal in its breadth and timeless in its appeal. Because of it he is a greater man in North Carolina to-day than on the day the State gave him its richest reward. Because of it, also, the forces of order and progress, equality and justice are stronger in North Carolina to-day than when he led them to their greatest victory.

In Governor Aycock's devotion to the weal and advancement of his own people there was not time for him to sow or to reap in the so-called larger fields. But North Carolina is a noble State, worthy of the undivided love of the illustrious son honored to-day. Other spheres of service, larger in terms of geography or population, might have lured him. Charles Brantley Aycock exemplified the eternal truth that the highest call that comes to any man is the duty that lies nearest. His mission, as he conceived it, commanded his whole-hearted espousal of causes projected for the strengthening and the elevation of the people of his own State.

Richard Grant White, writing of Palmerston, said he was a typical Englishman, having all the virtues and prejudices of his countrymen. In much the same way it might be said that Charles Brantley Aycock was a typical North Carolinian, embodying in his life the virtues, aspirations, the hopes, as well as the beliefs of his people. Some of those beliefs might be regarded as parochial. It is true that he was confessedly more state-minded than national-minded. But do not confuse that with prejudice. There was no room in his heart for that unwholesome attitude unless you account it prejudice that more conspicuously than any other North Carolina leader since Vance he identified himself with his people, making their cause his cause, their wrong his wrong, their progress his reward.

Born a little more than a year before the beginning of the War between the States, Governor Aycock remembered the return of his older brothers and their comrades from the Confederate Army, "weary, worn, and sorrowful, to find their farms gone to ruin, their fences down, their ditches filled, their stock slaughtered, in many instances their houses burned." He was old enough to understand how the iron entered the souls of these men as they drank to the dregs the bitterness of the cup of reconstruction. His impressionable young mind shared the resentment of his elders in the humiliation and injustice heaped upon his people. His father's house became a rendezvous for the farmers of the community. They gathered on his broad piazza summer evenings to discuss their problems when Union League and Ku-Klux organizations made political action a matter of vital preservation.

Frequently the boy crept down the back stairs in his night clothes and, hiding under the front-porch steps, listened to the political talk that stirred his elders. Public political discussion was then the chief interest of a people who believed the protection of the things most dear to them must come through political victory. Aycock attended political meetings at an age when most boys were thinking only of play. Serious conditions troubled the family and the State. The eloquence, some of it rude, fascinated him. He would return home to repeat pointed passages that stuck in a peculiarly retentive memory. The burden of the speeches he heard involved the restoration of government to the people from whom reconstruction had wrested it. Before he was out of his teens he had imbibed the spirit of the political orators and had developed a talent for public speaking which gave promise of the eloquence which enriched his later public career.

The Federal reconstruction administration in North Carolina, it must be remembered, was in the hands of officials most of whom did not enjoy or merit the confidence of the people. The soldier brothers of Aycock, in common with the people in general, regarded them as aliens to the spirit of North Carolina. For a long time even the Federal courts were held to be foreign to the genius and indifferent to the traditions of North Carolina.

In such an atmosphere Aycock developed a passionate love for his State and a profound conviction that it had been wronged by the Government of the country which the blood of his fathers had established. It was not until he reached manhood that this early resentment was erased. But it left its scars with him, and with the men of his generation, even though they later rejoiced that this is an indissoluble Union of indestructible States. In his riper years no more ardent lover of the Union lived, but always his dearest affection was for the government units that were nearest home.

In an impromptu address at the Charleston, S. C., exposition he shared honors with President Roosevelt. A speaker preceding him had said he "thanked God there was now no North, no South, no East, no West," seeming to be apologetic for the attitude of the South of a former day. Governor Aycock graciously said that "there is a very fine and high sense in which my distinguished friend said there is no North, and no South, and yet there is another and a finer sense in which I am glad to say to-day that there is a South." Touching upon the industries developed after its people had been stricken by four years of destructive war, he added:

"Nor am I ashamed of the mighty deeds which you wrought from 1861–1865. I shall forever defend these men and women, and I must do so in order to justify the splendid courage of the President of the United States," turning to Mr. Roosevelt, who was sitting on the platform. Continuing, Governor Aycock said: "They were a great folk, sturdy, determined, hot-blooded maybe, but their blood stayed hot through four years. Your hot-blooded man cools under less than four years of suffering. But it took from Bethel to Appomattox to cool the blood of these southern people. They were tired of fighting against their brothers, but they had just gotten themselves into good fighting training for fighting the greatest battles of life. And so I say that I have ceased to talk about the fact that we are in the Union, for we never got out. And if there be any State—in the Philippines or elsewhere—that wants to secede, we will teach them that they can not get out."

President Roosevelt joined in the applause, calling out: "You are all right, Governor," to which Aycock replied: "I will say for the President that I know he is happier that he may be a President of a people who are proud of their history than he would be to be President of a people who were ashamed of it."

It is an interesting aftermath of that meeting between Theodore Roosevelt and Charles Brantley Aycock that the President tendered to Aycock, after his term as governor expired, an appointment to a position of honor. Aycock declined it with high appreciation, saying to a friend: "I would not fit in. How could I oppose Republican policies and oppose Republican victory while holding office under a Republican President? Besides, if there is any public duty I owe, it is here in North Carolina where so much is to be done to educate the people and undergird and advance the material development of the State, to which tasks I long ago committed myself."

Invited to make a series of educational speeches in Maine, Governor Aycock enunciated the creed that his environment and love of home had developed and which made him the best-loved man in North Carolina: "I love my home town better than any town in Wayne County, I love Wayne County better than any other county in North Carolina, I love North Carolina better than any other State in the Union, I love the United States better than any other country in the world." He added, with the inimitable humor that characterized him, half jestingly and half seriously; "And I love this world better than the next."

He expressed his passion for home in the following extract from an address on Robert E. Lee, in which he ascribed to Lee the quality that marked his own life:

"The love of home, of family, of neighborhood, of county, of State predominated him. The elemental foundation of all free government is found in this vital fact. There can never be a free people save those who love and serve those closest to them first, and farthest away afterwards. The gospel must be preached to all the world, but its preaching must begin at Jerusalem. It could never have begun anywhere else, and if it had, it would never have gone anywhere else."

This philosophy, in a day when his home State needed him and leaned upon him and was nourished by his inspiring faith and accomplishments, accounts for his absorption in service at home.

Deeply interested in politics and profoundly versed in the great issues that touched the life of the Republic, he declined election as delegate to the national convention of his party and put aside the proffer of support for a position on the national ticket. Writing to a friend of a younger generation, who urged that, having done so much for the people of North Carolina, he ought to seek service in national affairs, Governor Aycock set forth what had actuated his course in these words:

"My own conviction is that the generation to which I belong, those in and around 50 years, will never furnish to the South the leadership which it must have. We came on during, or at the end of the war, and our environment has been such that we were compelled to devote ourselves to local issues. These issues are important; indeed, they were vital. The future of our State and section depended upon their right solution. But, vital as they were, they were narrow, and in the discussion of them and in working them out, we imbibed passions and prejudices that unfitted us for great work on the stage of the Nation. It was my hope, and still is, that our labors would not be in vain but would produce a stronger and broader leadership out of the generation to which you belong. That is my firm belief now."

What did Governor Aycock mean when he said: "Vital as the questions were that compelled us to devote ourselves to local issues, they were narrow, and in the discussion of them and in working them out, we imbibed passions and prejudices that unfitted us for great work on the stage of the Nation"? Clearly he was thinking about the question of suffrage in the South. The greatest wrong done to the southern white man and to the Negro in the reconstruction era was immediately entrusting all the enfranchised slaves with the ballot. Mr. Lincoln never favored it. On the contrary, he advised the Governor of Louisiana to grant suffrage at first only to such negroes as had acquired property or by education had shown fitness to use the ballot wisely. If this Lincoln plan of gradual extension of suffrage had prevailed over the Thaddeus Stevens plan, based upon political advantage rather than interest in the welfare and advancement of the Negro, what a Pandora's box of ills the whole country would have escaped.

Governor Aycock grew up in a district having 8,000 Negro voting majority. He saw how ignorant negro voters were used en masse by designing leaders, white and colored, to the injury of both races. Later, in 1894–1898, the manipulation of the solid Negro vote by unscrupulous and faithless white men brought a return of incompetent government to North Carolina. Men climbed to office by the support of ignorant and unqualified voters and then deserted them and kicked them over when they could no longer serve their selfish ends. The character and results of such government in this State was thus described by Governor Aycock in his inaugural address as Governor of North Carolina, January 15, 1901:

"Under their rule lawlessness stalked the State like a pestilence—death stalked at noonday—'sleep lay down armed'—the sound of the pistol was more frequent than the song of the mocking-bird—the screams of women and children fleeing from pursuing brutes closed the gates of our hearts with a shock.

To overthrow such administration Aycock was selected by the unanimous vote of his party as candidate for governor to lead in the most critical campaign of his generation. He was chosen by reason of the recognition of his "preeminent power to convince the minds of men and to arouse their highest and best emotions, to enthuse them with the truths of his cause, and lead them to action." In his first speech in the campaign he told the voters that the passage of the suffrage amendment "will mean an end of an era of crime and lawlessness, insure security of property and purity of politics, and no more rule of the incompetent and corrupt." He made a campaign without precedent in the annals of North Carolina, championing a constitutional amendment that would exclude from the ballot all negroes who lacked the necessary educational qualifications for the exercise of suffrage. In a contest involving bitterness and some racial animosities he lifted the cause above passion and prejudice and showed by every word and act a friendliness and sympathy for the uneducated negroes he was proposing to disfranchise. In it he won their lasting esteem and his subsequent policy proved his justice and friendship.

Governor Aycock declared that before the party he led had proposed the limitation on suffrage, "we endeavored with sincerity to bring the negroes to a realization of the true dignity of full citizenship," and pointed out that the State opened schools for them, cared for their afflicted, and yet "the result was a disappointment." Why? The 120,000 negro voters were the pawns of unworthy political leaders who employed them for their own undoing, bringing about a reign of terror in certain parts of the State.

Many people outside the State and some within its borders believed the policy of which Aycock was the chosen crusader was born of desire for political advantage and prejudice of the Negro race. Undoubtedly political victory came to the party espousing the suffrage amendment. But neither of these considerations controlled, certainly not with Aycock. His magnanimous nature forbade hatred or injustice toward a people wanting in power to demand and secure justice. During the epochal campaigns from 1894 to 1900 Aycock pledged that if power were given to his party it would be exercised in such spirit as to help the negro as well as to restore order and promote prosperity. Proof that he entertained no hostility to the negro is afforded by this extract in his speech of acceptance:

"May the era of good feeling among us be the outcome of this contest. Then we shall learn, if we do not already know, that while universal suffrage is a failure, universal justice is the perpetual decree of Almighty God, and that we are intrusted with powers not for our good alone but for the Negro as well. We hold our title to power by the tenure of service to God, and if we fail to administer equal and exact justice to the Negro, whom we deprive of suffrage, we shall in the fullness of time lose power ourselves, for we must know that the God who is love trusts no people with authority for the purpose of enabling them to do injustice to the weak."

This noble consecration pledge was the guiding star of his administration and those succeeding it. His policies of justice and equality brought peace and order. Freed from political disturbance, there followed an "outburst of industry" and agriculture, commerce, and manufacturing. Banking expansion initiated the largest growth and prosperity that North Carolina had known in all its history. The disgrace of lynching faded under a sound public sentiment strengthened by the new governor and the just administration of law. This was Aycock's creed:

"The law must have full sway. It will be enforced with impartiality, and I shall strive to be a just governor of all the people, without regard to party, color, or creed. The mob has no place in our civilization. No man is so high that the law shall not be enforced against him, and no man is so low that it shall not reach down to lift him up, if may be, and set him on his feet again and bid him Godspeed to better things."

When it came to enact election laws in consonance with the new suffrage amendment, Governor Aycock demanded that they should have in them no provision open to unfair operation. He had favored the North Carolina method of restricting suffrage, because it gave no opportunity to election officials for discrimination, but was open and understandable. If for a time under its operation advantage rested with the whites, the time was fixed definitely when the education was to be the only qualification for all voters. Equally resolved that elections should be fair, he insisted that each party should have representation upon all election boards from the precinct to the State board. He never rested until such legislation was enacted. Thus was the "vital" and "narrow" issue, which monopolized his talents for so many years, met by Aycock and the leading men of his Commonwealth for the weal of all its people.

UNIVERSAL EDUCATION

Another "vital issue," local in its setting and testing the stuff of which Aycock was made, was raised during his administration. It was the question of universal education, embracing the children of both races. During his candidacy Governor Aycock had committed himself and his party to this principle. Long before this the State had established separate public schools for both races, but the terms were short and many of them were indifferently manned. Immediately upon his inauguration larger sums were required for improved schools, and this necessitated an increase in taxation. There were those citizens in the State who had not been converted to the Aycock theory that the State owed equal school facilities to both races.

They protested that as the white people paid the larger portion of the school taxes, it was not just that the negroes, whose tax contribution was relatively small, should have school terms equal in length to those of the white children. Indeed, there appeared an element who did not believe in the education of the negro. They demanded that the money paid by white taxpayers should be applied solely to white schools and that the negro schools should have only the money paid by negro taxpayers. Those entertaining this view were more vocal than numerous. To these dissenters from Aycock's educational policy were added the critics who complained of other policies of his administration. The opposition was increased by some who saw in Aycock's great popularity a danger to their political ambitions.

Altogether, therefore, quite a body was massed in opposition to that portion of his educational policy which included equal schools for the negro. These opponents caused to be introduced in the legislature an amendment to the constitution for a distribution of school taxes on the basis of what each race paid. The manifest purpose of this amendment was to restrict the opportunity for the negro to become educated and qualify himself as a voter. Governor Aycock in the most unmistakable terms let the legislators understand that he should regard the adoption of such an amendment as a violation of the pledge made by him and his party, and that if the plighted pledge was broken, over his opposition, he "would resign his office and return to private life." He said: "It must be manifest that such a provision as this is an injustice to the negro and is injurious to us." He declared it was unconstitutional, was in violation of the fourteenth amendment, and contrary to the platforms of both political parties. His opposition strengthened the hands of the men of like views in the general assembly and prevented the measure from coming to a vote.

However, its champions secured the adoption of resolutions for such segregation of school funds by the conventions in several counties of the State. In his message to the general assembly of 1903, Governor Aycock, after an able and conclusive argument against the suggestion, declaring it to be "unjust, unwise, and unconstitutional," said: "It would wrong both races, would bring our State into the condemnation of a just opinion elsewhere, and mark us as a people who have turned backward." He pleaded with the people thus: "Let us not seek to be the first State in the Union to make the weak helpless. This would be a leadership that would bring us no honor but much shame." His strong argument determined its fate, and it could not muster a corporal's guard in the legislature.

When the Democratic State convention met in 1904, there was a well-organized movement to bring the question up in the hope of securing approval of race tax segregation. There was a rumor, which lacked confirmation, that an element would howl down anyone who should support Aycock's universal educational policy. He was told that if he raised the issue and defended his course he would experience humiliation. The suggestion that he should avoid this controversial question was met by a resolve to make it the central idea in the address he was scheduled to deliver. When he appeared on the platform the atmosphere was cool, not to say hostile. He began quietly and confidently, piling reason upon reason, with a winning and lucid manner which few could resist or refute. Within 10 minutes the coolness had turned to warmth. From that time on he was master of the vast assembly and the delegates enthusiastically approved what a portion had entered the hall to condemn. A greater oratorical conquest is not recorded in the annals. His long-time law partner, Judge Frank A. Daniels, gave this judicial estimate of what will always be regarded as the high-water mark of convincing eloquence in North Carolina:

"I have long regarded this as the greatest triumph of moral and intellectual powers attained by a North Carolinian, certainly in my day. Its immediate and ultimate effect was to break in pieces the opposition to our educational advance which has never since been able to rear its head; and this victory of truth and justice has made secure the progress of enlightenment throughout the length and breadth of the State."

If the "vital issues" to which Governor Aycock referred were narrow in the sense that they were sectional, the cause to which Aycock's life was consecrated was universal. It was the one into which Jefferson breathed the breath of life in Virginia and which enabled Horace Mann to give primacy and distinction to Massachusetts—the duty of the State to set up public schools for all the children. Mainly because of this faith Aycock came to be known as "the educational Governor of North Carolina"; and because he transformed educational thought and progress in North Carolina, the people of his State have caused his statue to stand in this place. It is the lasting tribute of a people who are grateful for his translated vision of universal education. As a boy he was denied this inalienable right. He never went to a public school until he entered the University of North Carolina, established in the Constitution of 1789 as "the head of the public-school system" before there were any public schools. The few schools supported by taxation were of only a few weeks duration and generally inefficient. The educational fund built up before 1860 was swept away by war or squandered by reconstruction. Young Aycock, thanks to the pride of a family whose members early perceived he had rare gifts, was given the best instruction in private schools which his section afforded. He learned easily; and when most boys were wrestling with Latin verbs, young Aycock was translating English into Latin with the utmost facility and laying the foundations of accurate scholarship and style which lifted him above his fellow students both in the preparatory schools and at the university.

The hour may not be fixed when, like Samuel of old, he heard the voice setting him apart as the leader of public education, and answered, "Here am I." Before he was of age he taught in a public school. Among his closest friends when he was a student in the university were three men who did more to revolutionize North Carolina educationally than any three others among the many who have poured their lives out in that endeavor—Dr. Edwin A. Alderman, who became successively president of the University of North Carolina, Tulane, and the University of Virginia; Dr. Charles D. McIver, who founded the North Carolina College for Women and was the educational dynamo of his generation; and Dr. James Y. Joyner, under whose leadership as State superintendent of schools in Aycock's administration a schoolhouse was built every day in the year including Sunday. These men and others were fired by love of State and troubled because many children were growing up without schooling. "There was no better place, I think, for the making of leaders in the world than Chapel Hill in the late seventies," said Doctor Alderman. "The mode of life was simple, rugged, almost primitive. Our young hearts, aflame with the impulses of youth, were quietly conscious of the vicissitudes and sufferings through which our fathers had just passed. A heroic tradition pervaded the place, while hope and struggle, rather than despair or repining, shone in the purpose of the resolute men who were rebuilding the famous old school."

With a zeal as holy as sent the Wesleys from Oxford to preach a gospel of universal salvation, these four young men left the university consumed with a zeal for universal education. They started a revival that swept over the State, culminating in its glow and glory during the years when Aycock was governor of the State. Aycock went into the law to become the educational statesman. The other three went into the school room and from that day were united and dedicated to one great aim—the establishment of an educational system that would remove the stigma of illiteracy. The influences they created are seen in the magnificent school buildings that give honor to the State and guarantee the opportunity to every child to secure a common-school education.

The first public office Governor Aycock held was county superintendent of the public schools of Wayne County and the second was as chairman of the school board in his home town of Goldsboro. Ending his term as governor, the last office he held was on the same school board. No perfunctory official was he, but a trustee who gave his time and thought to the cause nearest his heart.

Horace Mann may have been as eloquent an advocate of public education or as efficient an educational statesman as Charles B. Aycock. If so, no other public man in the United States deserves equal rank with the North Carolina Governor in the sphere in which he made his largest contribution.

Unless there is appreciation of the lack of decent schoolhouses and trained teachers and money for schools and knowledge of the widespread indifference to the right of the child to go to school and a sense of the power of the widespread prejudice against taxation for the education of the children of other people, unless the condition prevailing in Aycock's youth can be visualized, there can be no proper appraisement of the revolution of public sentiment under his leadership and that of his coworkers.

As "educational governor" not only did he create sentiment for public schools but he brought about an era of good feeling and cooperation of all the educational institutions in the State, secured larger appropriations for State schools, and stimulated gifts to church and other colleges. One day publication was made that an old and useful church institution for the education of women was to be closed and its magnificent campus cut up and sold as city lots. "No educational institution shall close its doors in North Carolina during my administration," he declared, as he announced he would speak for the continuation of the college in the town in which it was located. The college was not closed, and shortly was enlarged to accommodate its increased attendance.

He was an evangel of the new order, an order dedicated to the "equal right of every child born on earth to have the opportunity to burgeon out all that there is within him." His conviction and his eloquence stirred North Carolina to a zeal from which the State has never slumbered and in the wake of which have come the manifestations of progress that now distinguish it. He spoke in every county in North Carolina and in many other States upon occasion. His addresses on universal education became as familiar and as famous as Webster's oration on the Constitution and the Union, and quite as eloquent and effective. Like Webster's masterpiece, it was a growth. Webster while a teacher just out of college gave the substance of the same argument in a small Maine town in a Fourth of July address that he employed in his famous reply to Hayne. But in the years it had evolved from a patriotic oration of a young man into the great oration of the master of assemblies. It was the same with Aycock's masterpiece. It was first given in its essence in his home township of Nahunte. From frequent repetition and polishing, it became the masterpiece which Aycock was delivering on the night of April 4, 1912, at Birmingham, Ala., when death claimed him.

"God Almighty, who is no respecter of persons, has made it so that you can not get the best for your boy and your girl until you are ready to give the best to my boy and my girl," he declared, and demonstrated his point with most convincing illustrations. Then he added:

"You are going to educate your girl; I know you are. You are going to sit up all night to educate her; you are going to save to educate her; going to economize; going to be stingy to educate her. Maybe you want her to be a musician. Well, I am going to tell you. You can send her to all the schools; you can let her burn the midnight oil; you can let her study under great musicians until she is almost blind; you can send her to the conservatory of music, you can send her abroad until her whole soul thrills and feels the glory of her gifted music, but she can not make music to people that do not understand. You can not talk to an audience that can not hear. Governor, did you ever try it?

Well, I have. When I was governor I made speeches all over North Carolina. I canvassed the State for four years in behalf of the education of the children of the State, right straight along; sometimes on Sunday they would ask me down to the churches to talk, and I always talked about education—"

With these words he fell dead. He died like his father, who dropped dead while opening a conference at Aycock's Primitive Baptist Church, Wilson County, N. C. The State of North Carolina, "like Niobe, was all tears" when the news of his sudden death reached its people. Millions have been appropriated and stately memorials erected in honor of the men who gave their lives in the World War, but in North Carolina to-day the people regard the sacrifice Governor Aycock made to open larger doors to the children as constituting him the great casualty of the war against illiteracy. It was this universal feeling in the State that brings us here to-day.

Because Governor Aycock chose to deny himself ambition for official station in the Nation, feeling an irresistible call to give himself to the rebuilding of an ancient Commonwealth, it must not be inferred that he was not deeply concerned and profoundly informed as to national problems and national affairs. His own people were compelled to construct a foundation upon which to stand in the rebuilding of the State. This was vital to them and to him. It came first and commanded all his powers and allegiance. The people felt "he was come to the kingdom for such a time as this." He was truly the Moses who led them toward the promised land. Events have proved he was right, for though nearly three score and ten years have passed since Appomattox, neither of the chief political parties has nominated a southern man for President. It was not that he and others lacked ambition or the fitness for the Chief Magistracy. It was, certainly, for a long period because engrossing State issues and local demands may have disqualified them "for great work on the stage of the Nation." He could say with Stevenson that he could "renounce when that shall be necessary and not be embittered." For all along he believed, as he wrote to a young friend, "It was my hope, and still is, that our labors would not be in vain but would produce a stronger, broader leadership out of the generation to which you belong."

The country produced no man of his era who was more profoundly versed in the issues which divided political parties, particularly the tariff question around which so many political battles have been waged. He was familiar with the debates and papers on this subject from the time of Hamilton and Jefferson. In his last written speech, in the early part of 1912, the ablest and most illuminating treaties upon Democratic doctrine of the half century, Governor Aycock declared:

"I agree with Governor Woodrow Wilson that the tariff is the one central issue. It is at the head of every other economic question we have to deal with, and until we have adjusted that properly we can settle nothing in a way that will be lasting and satisfactory." It was a tragedy that he died before he could cooperate with Wilson, as he made sound tariff measures the first item in his program of reforms. I have been privileged to hear such authorities on the tariff as Roger Q. Mills, William L. Wilson, Grover Cleveland, William Jennings Bryan, and Woodrow Wilson elucidate the tariff question, but I weigh my words when I declare that not one of them surpassed Aycock in knowledge or apt illustration or lucidity of statement or convincing argument. In his last political speech Governor Aycock compressed his attitude on the tariff in these four propositions:

"1. I am in favor of a tariff for revenue only.

"2. Such tariff to be levied—

"(a) On luxuries.

"(b) On comforts.

"(c) And only as a last resort on necessaries.

"3. Such tariff to bear equally upon all productive energy engaged in agriculture, mining, or manufacturing.

"4. Such tariff to bear equally upon every section of the country. And under this head I would observe that I do not believe in protection for New England and free trade for North Carolina, but a tariff for revenue only, applicable alike to both sections. I would not be guilty of the quixotic folly of compelling my own people to bear an unequal proportion of the burdens of the maintenance of Government; nor would, I on the other hand, exact one cent of tribute from any other section of the country in order that my own State and the South, which I love with my whole heart, should prosper at the expense of others."

His discussion of the tariff was no siccant presentation of schedules. It was the philosophy of taxation. He properly regarded the tariff as a moral question which lifted it to the heights. He drew a graphic picture of how he had seen, during the span of his life, "the struggle of the people for continued and enlarged freedom seeking to work itself out" by invention and industry, and commerce providing fabulous wealth and enormous products, with the prophecies of the orator that "with the coming of this wealth there should come also a better age and a finer chance for those who sweat and struggle." He was forced to this conclusion: "And yet I have looked in vain for the coming of that hour, and as I read the current history of the times, I find strikes and lockouts and cold and suffering greater than when Great Britain acknowledged the independence of the thirteen American Colonies."

The superabundance of the few and the want of the many, the flow of wealth along smooth channels to the coffers of the elect and the struggle of the masses of his countrymen for wages barely enough to keep soul and body together, struck Aycock's democratic heart with a deep conviction of the essential injustices of the existing system.

To him the problem was not insoluble. Unlike many then, and more now, he did not sit in the ashes and regret that there was no escape from the conditions he deplored. He knew that there was a remedy for the unequal distribution of wealth, and a simple one, if only it could be put to work. He said in a notable address:

"Yet I can not bring myself to believe that the problem is insoluble. Yes; I believe that it has already been solved and the solution has been forgotten by us. It was solved in the single phrase 'Equal opportunity to all and special privileges to none.' It found its correct exposition in the inaugural address of President Jefferson when he insisted that the Government should be economically conducted to the end that labor shall be lightly burdened."

He pointed out that ever since this utterance we have been going away steadily from it and seeking to find in the extension of special privilege to some the hope that, out of their abundance, they would make easier the condition of all. He laid down this proposition, and by powerful reasoning and illustration proved it: "You may tax some people rich by creating a monopoly by reason of taxation, but you can not tax all the people rich." Proceeding upon that sound thesis, too often overlooked, he traced how the protective tariff had bred trusts. In one of his best speeches on the hustings, speaking to make plain and clear a subject often dull, he made the operations of the protective tariff so lucid that a child could understand it. Here is his graphic portrayal of what happens under high tariff laws:

"By means of this protective tariff what has happened? You can build up an industry by it. I have never disputed that proposition anywhere. We could grow tea in South Carolina by operation of the protective tariff, Senator Tillman says. If you will make it high enough, you can grow it in South Carolina and make some people rich. You can build up a special industry. Don't you see when they put on that high tax and exclude foreign competition the manufacturer starts up? One man starts with a capital of $100,000. He hurries up his plant. He has a large market, and it is exclusive. The tariff has shut out all foreign competition. He goes to work and gets his goods on the market and sells them nearly as high as the tariff will allow him. He coins money and gets rich fast. The next man sees this, and says, 'If A is making money that way, I can, too.' He builds a $250,000 factory and gets rich, too. Then C comes in and builds a factory for $1,000,000, and the prices go a little lower. And so they keep on until they have 25 or 26 plants throughout the United States supplying the needs of the American people, and they have brought the prices down as low as the foreign market. We are reveling in low prices for these manufactured goods.

"Finally the smartest one of these fellows drops a letter to the others. He says:

"'MY DEAR SIR: You and I are engaged in the same line of business. For the past few years we have not been making much profit. In the beginning we made a great deal of money, but for the last few years, by reason of competition with one another, it is getting almost impossible for us to make a living. It is folly for us to waste our lives in this mad struggle of competition. I am going to be at the Waldorf-Astoria next Thursday at 3 o'clock p. m., where I hope to see you and have a little conference.'

"He sends that to the others, and the next Thursday the whole push is there. They eat a little, and drink a little, and smoke a great deal, and finally the same fellow says, 'Boys, this is all foolishness; we are cutting each other's throats. We have the American market and there is no sense in barely making a living. We used to make big money and can do it again. I want us to form what is known as a trust; that is to say, I want us to form one great big corporation. You take stock in this corporation to the extent of the value of your plant, and I will take stock to the value of my plant, and so on around, and we will have it all in one company. We won't have but one president, one superintendent, two or three drummers, and we will discharge all the rest of them and centralize these plants and the management, and produce our product cheaper and earn a bigger dividend, and not only put our plants in at the valuation they are now worth, but we will double the amount of stock and give each one twice what his plant is worth and still make a dividend.'

"That looks good to all of them except one fellow born a hard-shell Baptist Democrat. They are all like Paul. 'None of these things moves me,' he says. 'I have been an independent manufacturer and am going to remain one still.' They say, 'All right, Bill. Good-by.' Bill goes down home and goes to work and overhauls his plant, and oils it up and gets all the rust out of it and makes it run as smoothly as possible. He begins to economize because he knows there is a good fight on. The other 25 form their combination and put out their goods and offer them on the market a little higher than before, and Bill sells at the old price, so they can not get much rise on them because Bill is offering his goods to the jobbers a little cheaper than theirs. Finally they send a fellow down in Bill's neighborhood, and every time Bill tries to go down a little they go down. They tell their representative, 'Every time Bill goes down on those goods, you go two better.' Bill goes down 5 points and they go down 15. Bill goes down 5 more and they go down 15.

"It is beginning to wear on Bill. He is turning gray and getting pale. He has been a tactful, pleasant-faced fellow, and he used to go home in the afternoon and take his wife and children to ride in the automobile, or, better, in the old-fashioned buggy. Now he does not get home until dark, and there is a scowl on his face. Mary meets him at the door and says, 'William, what is the matter?' He scowls and says, 'Nothing the matter with me.' The trust had just gone down 15 points the day before, and he knows 5 points more will bankrupt him. He goes to bed and dreams dreams and sees visions, and his visions of the devil are the most real. He gets up unrefreshed and a cold bath fails to put him in good humor. The morning is a bright, glorious, sunshiny morning, and there is a crispness in the air. Nothing appeals to Bill. Bankruptcy is before him. From being wealthy he is about to descend to poverty. From having his family have everything they want, they are about to descend to want.

"He finds a representative of the trust in his office. 'Good morning; how are you feeling, Bill?' 'Don't feel much. How are you?' 'I am feeling fine. Now, Bill, there is no use in this foolishness. Come to terms. While we are in the humor, you had better get out. We don't want to hurt anybody. We are good folks. You have $100,000 in your plant. We will give you $100,000 stock in our concern and a $50,000 check on top of it.' Bill had had visions of bankruptcy, and his wife wants a new automobile and his children want to go to college. He is mad, but he reaches over and says: 'Make out your papers,' and he makes his deed and gets his $100,000 in stock, and he sticks that check for $50,000 into his pocket and walks around town with a stoop in his shoulders and a scowl on his face, but there is a smile lurking around the corner of his eye. He banks that check, and in a week's time Bill is beginning to smile again, and in a month's time he is driving out with his family. The world looks good to him. He votes with the Democrats, for a while against the trusts, but he is softening. At the end of the quarter Bill gets a 10 per cent dividend on that $100,000 stock, and he sticks that $10,000 into his pocket and he steps about 3 feet at every step now. He is still mad, but he will vote the Democratic ticket, provided the fellow on the ticket is a good man.

"Another quarter rolls around and another $10,000 check comes in. Well, sir, there ain't hardly room on the sidewalk for Bill. His thumbs have found the armholes of his vest. 'I am a Democrat, but I tell you this Democratic Party is getting mighty silly, putting out a heap of fool-fangled notions. Better let the business men run it. I will vote the Democratic ticket, but I am getting mighty tired of them calling on me to vote for the kind of men I have been voting for, and I am not going to do it any more.'

"Another quarter rolls around and then at the end of the year they send Bill a stock dividend of 25 per cent. He says, 'I am getting tired of this whole business anyhow. I have long thought those Democrats had too many fool things in their heads. I believe I will vote for Taft this fall.' Just as soon as the Republicans hear tell of that they elect him chairman, and at that instant they become respectable.

"Oh, my countrymen! This is no fancy picture. It is the everlasting truth of history as it has been written in the United States for the past 20 years, and is being written to-day. It is the history of the United States as it must needs be written and always will be written as long as the doctrine prevails that the power rests in the Government to levy taxation for any purpose other than the administration of the Government. You may take every other plank out of the Democratic platform, but I will not submit to putting power into the hands of anybody to tax me poor and to tax you rich."

Governor Aycock went further and demonstrated that the tariff "corrupts the entire body politic," and proved that it is "a moral issue." Once enjoying the benefit of this subsidy the beneficiaries contribute to campaign funds to keep or put in power the men who will continue to vote them largesses and to defeat those who believe that taxation can be levied only for public purposes," declared Governor Aycock. He denied that combinations would produce more cheaply or sell their products at a lower price to the consumer. Answering the contention that such claim was well founded, Governor Aycock said:

"But fortunately at this juncture Mr. Brandeis, of Boston, in his evidence before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate has demonstrated beyond all peradventure that at this very point the trust fails instead of succeeds. The highest efficiency of production and the greatest economy attainable are to be found not in gigantic plants but in the reasonably small ones. Efficiency is due to the cooperation of every man engaged in the production, and this cooperation is largely dependent upon the esprit de corps which is developed, so that each worker in his department is necessary to every worker in every other department, and when the heads of these departments are in direct contact with all the men, and when each man feels that the business is his own. When the business grows beyond this point and the men become units instead of individuals and are counted by numbers instead of names, inefficiency creeps in and expenses increase in the various departments. The only way to secure the highest efficiency and the greatest economy is by a large number of plants under separate and independent conduct, each one striving to the utmost limit with the power of every individual in its employment to outdo the others."

Governor Aycock ended a powerful discussion on trusts by saying:

"So I conclude on this subject that the trusts are not to be regulated but destroyed and supplanted by the old-time organization willing to fight, to work, to struggle, to invent, to discuss and initiate, willing and able to compete, and actually competing for the business of the world, asking no favor, paying for no special privilege, and eternally opposed to conferring special benefits upon others."

That is an eternally true statement of sound doctrine. If it had controlled governmental action in the years behind us, the spectacle of trust-created multimillionaires and hosts of unemployed could never have arisen to menace the American system in our time.

THE BEST LOVED

No man deserves a place here with America's immortals because of personal qualities. He must have rendered some service to mankind to be regarded as eligible. But if sincerity and simplicity and beautiful character and garnering the love of a great State could entitle any man to this distinction, then North Carolina would feel justified in saying that it had selected Governor Aycock for the niche assigned to it. He was the best-loved man the State had produced since the statue of Gov. Zebulon Baird Vance was unveiled in this hall. It is not alone because of official station that the State chose its illustrious war governor and equally illustrious educational governor as the two sons who most fittingly represent the spirit and character and flavor of its people. As the man is always superior to his song or speech or invention or achievement, so are Vance and Aycock greater than their public contributions. In the whole history of the State, which has been fruitful of men who attained eminence, Vance and Aycock, by common consent, are most representative of the people from whom they sprang and who delighted to honor them. It is a distinction worthy to be coveted for a man to be called to high office by his people because they trust him and value his ability.

It is a greater and a rarer honor when to their esteem and confidence they add their personal attachment and love. Love is something which neither wisdom nor learning can command. It comes only from a sympathetic understanding and common aspiration. The leader who wins the hearts of a people must have a heart that beats in unison with theirs. The people have rare discernment. They are never deceived into giving their affections to a man unless his whole aim is to serve the common good. They often give their votes to men who have capacity for public service without personal affection for the people whom they serve, but they do not give their affection to those who flatter them or seek to please as a means to their own ends. Rather they pass over such men and love those who are frank, sincere, genuine, and put service above ambition. Having this thought in mind, speaking at the University of North Carolina, Hon. Charles W. Tillett, sr., of Charlotte, N. C., gave this just appraisement of Governor Aycock:

"I appeal to you, sir, the president of this great university, to emblazon somewhere upon the walls of these buildings in letters of gold, set in a frame of silver:

"'The public life of Charles B. Aycock teaches that a man may have an abiding mastery over the affections of the people without sacrificing either self-respect or principle.'"

AYCOCK AS A LAWYER

If you were to ask the average North Carolinian why Aycock was chosen from the list of North Carolina's ablest leaders, the answer would not be because he was the greatest lawyer, though in the practice of the law and in its mastery he stood equal to the best in his generation. People do not erect monuments to men because they are learned in the law unless all that they know is brought under requisition for the benefit of mankind.

"Where have you been keeping that wonderful lawyer and orator?" Chief Justice White asked a North Carolina friend upon the occasion of Governor Aycock's appearance in an important case before the Supreme Court of the United States. "In all my experience in the court I have heard no lawyer present his case more lucidly and effectively and delightfully. He has the faculty of presenting his contentions so convincingly that his proposition is stated as if it were the necessary conclusion. His style and logic prove his superior quality and charm as an orator and as a lawyer."

A like tribute came from Justice Harlan: "You have a wonderful man in Governor Aycock," he said. "My dissenting opinion in the case he argued was based almost entirely upon Aycock's argument."

Many like tributes from members of the North Carolina judiciary and bar could be quoted to show his high rank as a lawyer and his primacy as an advocate. Judge Henry Groves Connor, of the State supreme court and the United States district court, who had known Aycock from his boyhood and was intimately associated with him, concluded a perfect tribute by writing:

"Both by precept and exemple he taught and practiced, illustrated and emphasized the truth that the administration of justice is the highest duty as well as the highest privilege of man. The law, to him, was a jealous mistress, demanding his best powers and most reverent service. In our active practice, in all its departments, for more than a quarter of a century, no man thought or suggested that he had perverted justice, made falsehood to triumph, truth to be sacrificed, or used his privileges to minister in the courts for other than honest and honorable means."

Learned in the law, he was always at his best in the contests in the courthouse. His partner, Judge Frank Arthur Daniels, gives this graphic picture of his conduct of cases in which he appeared and which gave him leadership at the bar:

"It was one of the great experiences of a lifetime, not to be forgotten, to have seen him at his best for the defendant in a capital case, contesting every inch, watching every development, resisting the introduction of damaging testimony, protecting his client from every aspersion, and, when the case went to the jury, rising to the height of the occasion, dissecting every portion of the testimony, laying bare every motive of the prosecution and witnesses, exposing every fallacy and every falsehood, tearing away every mask of hypocrisy with the power of reason, ridicule, satire, and invective; constructing upon the evidence an impregnable defense, fortifying it with every argument, calling to his aid every resource known to ingenuity and sustaining it with overpowering eloquence until the prisoner was acquitted amid the plaudits of the spectators and the approval of the court."

Governor Aycock is not of the elect in this presence because he was a leader in the business world, for his life was so consecrated to securing opportunities for the child and the average man, that, like Agassiz, he "did not have time to make money." In fact, money meant nothing to him. As governor he gave stimulus to business and industrial development. While he was building a schoolhouse every day, factories were springing up and business was expanding, progress and development had waited upon the peace and good government ushered in with his administration as governor.

Without the gift of eloquence he could not have reached the hearts and mobilized the people to the giant tasks which they achieved, overcoming obstacles hitherto deemed insurmountable. Eloquence Governor Aycock possessed in a superlative degree. It was inborn. As a boy in school, when he was to recite, the children and teachers from adjoining rooms would crowd into the chapel to hear him declaim some great oration he had committed to memory and into which he imparted a meaning which the statesman who wrote it would have coveted. When, later, in debating societies he wrote his own speeches there was something indefinable in manner and delivery that gave them a charm which none could resist. It was not that he had the lute voice of Bryan at Chicago or the majesty of Webster in the Senate or the grace of Prentiss. He had none of these gifts. Neither graceful nor musical nor majestic, his oratory had a flavor all his own. He never spoke without full preparation. He often wrote his addresses, and always chose his words with care. He was deeply read and his mind was stored with the best that great men had written. He had style of a timbre all his own, that indefinable quality which clothes thought with the right words, so put together as to please, instruct, and convince.

What is eloquence? Governor Aycock thus defined it:

"Eloquence is simply the response of the common sense or general mind to that which the speaker is saying. Slumbering in the minds of men is a sense of right and justice, and the man who can interpret the feeling and give it expression is the eloquent man, and this is why he can so mightily move men." This definition leaves out the divine spark which enables the orator to play on the hearts of men and often to win them over against their will. It is a definition born of the modesty of the orator, who gave to his auditors more of the credit for the oration than they deserved. This was in keeping with an opinion he voiced frequently in his educational speeches. In one of them he said:

"No man can speak to a people who can not hear, no musician can play for those whose ears are not attuned to harmony, and no man can paint for those whose eyes are not trained to see the beauty which he produces. There must be an appreciative audience before any man can do his best."

A REAL DEMOCRAT

They called Aycock "the educational governor." He was that, but he was more than that. I make bold to say that his advocacy of universal education was born of a principle deeper and broader than the learning of what is contained in books. It is true to say that his advocacy of education and public schools was a by-product of an underlying faith that embraced the very foundations that must exist in a democracy. That principle was that he profoundly thought all men are created equal and have the inherent right to stand upon equality with all other men. He held every man to be entitled to every right and opportunity that was enjoyed by the other sons of men and that caste or class or privilege were subversive to the spirit of American life and its institutions. He was a democrat in heart and in all the relations of life. No artificial barrier shut him out from his fellows, and he believed civilization's greatest evil the denial of the doctrine Jefferson incorporated in his declaration and in his first inaugural. He wanted no door open to him that could be slammed in the faces of others.

Such injustice aroused his lifelong hostility. He insisted upon the right to enjoy every advantage that came to others. Charles Brantley Aycock was a deeply religious man; the Bible was his daily companion; he knew it thoroughly and drew upon it for his most forceful illustrations. His college mate and law partner, Judge Robert W. Winston, compresses the faith that was the mudsill upon which Aycock built his life. Judge Winston says: "Aycock's faith in God was sublime. He had no more doubt in the divinity of Jesus Christ than he had of his own existence. He once said that the best thing about the Christian religion to him was that your sins were not only forgiven but blotted out."

It was this faith that inspired lifelong devotion to the doctrine of equality which was the dominant force of his private and public career. It is a doctrine nearest divine of any human creed. Faith in God must inspire the highest faith in man and consecration to his well-being. Herein was the secret spring of Governor Aycock's hatred of all inequality, the espousal of equal opportunity, and the love of fellow men. "Faith is the victory that overcomes the world."

Why did Governor Aycock's heart flame with the passion of universal education? As a boy he saw youths of good mind grow to manhood without a chance even to learn the three R's. He saw men and women of rare qualities who had to make their mark in legal papers because there were no public schools when they were growing up. These injustices and inequalities all about him, in his own neighborhood and near him, made him highly resolve that he would consecrate his life to see that every child in the State of every race should have equal opportunity for education with all other children. Equality for all was his master passion. He closed his last written address with this declaration of his optimistic philosophy:

"We stand a-tiptoe on the misty mountain height and see the morning sun make purple the glories of the east. We are entering upon a new day, the day of equality, of opportunity, the hour when every man shall be free to work mightily for himself until his soul, filled to satisfaction, shall overflow with a common benefit to mankind, owing no tribute to anyone and bound only to love his fellow man and serve his God as to him may seem best.

"'May these things be!'
Sighing she spoke;
'I fear they will not,
Dear, but let us type them now
In our own lives,
And this proud watchword rest,
Of equal.'"

"Equal! That is the word! On that word I plant myself and my party—the equal right of every child born on earth to have the opportunity to burgeon out all that there is within him."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I rose to reserve an objection in order to make a statement with reference to the request for extension of remarks yesterday on the beer bill. It was my intention and purpose to object to every request for extension put by the Speaker that I could hear. I see in the RECORD this morning that the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. McLEOD, put in an extension. I heard the gentleman ask in a way that was not heard because of the noise—he only had one-quarter of a minute to speak—he made a request for an extension, but it was not heard or put by the Speaker. I so informed the gentleman from Michigan that I was listening, and that the request was not put or granted, and notwithstanding that he put in an extension in the RECORD. I make this statement merely for the purpose of conveying to Members of the House that I was not permitting one Member to get an extension and depriving some other Members of the privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute to correct the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DYER, in reference to the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The RECORD shows, on page 10955 that Mr. McLEOD had unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

Mr. DYER. I am stating that I was listening carefully, and the request was not put by the Speaker.

JOHN SNIDER

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, there is in the gallery a distinguished visitor who knows how to do something useful. It gives me infinite and inexpressible pleasure to present to the House the greatest barbecue artist in the world, Mr. John Snider, of Amarillo, Tex. [Applause.]

MEMORIAL EXERCISES

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives to-morrow will hold services in memory of Members of the Senate and House who have died since the memorial services were held in the last session of the Seventy-first Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the order of exercises and proceedings of the service be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House be granted until the close of the present session the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD upon the life, character, and public services of Members of Congress in whose memory the services will be held.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Also, Mr. Speaker, I might say that the services will be held at 12 o'clock and will continue for one hour.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question? As I understand it there will be no further business to-morrow after the memorial exercises.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know. It depends upon whether we take up the guaranty bank deposit bill for general debate. We can not go into it to-day as some Members are sick. We may take it up under general debate to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois would have to obtain unanimous consent for that purpose, because the resolution of respect provides that the House adjourn at the conclusion of the memorial exercises to-morrow. Does the gentleman desire to put a unanimous-consent request now?

Mr. RAINEY. I can not put that request now, as we have first to hear from a Member who is ill.

The SPEAKER. That can be determined later.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next it shall be in order for the House to stand in recess from the conclusion of its afternoon session until 8 o'clock p. m., and that from 8 o'clock p. m. until 10.30 o'clock p. m. it shall be in order under the old rule to call bills on the Private Calendar, commencing with the starred bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Did the gentleman say under the old rule?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—O'CONNOR v. DISNEY

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 2, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 233

Contested-election case of O'Connor v. Disney

Resolved, That Wesley E. Disney was elected a Representative in the Seventy-second Congress from the first congressional district in the State of Oklahoma, and is entitled to a seat as such Representative.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] kindly give me his attention? How much time does the minority desire in the consideration of this case?

Mr. SCHAFER. I have not had any requests for time. I think if we could arrange to have half an hour on this side, all of which we may not use, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Then half an hour will be sufficient for the minority?

Mr. SCHAFER. I believe so.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this resolution be limited to 1 hour and 15 minutes, 45 minutes to be in the control of myself, representing the majority, and half an hour in control of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], representing the minority.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, there is no more important function that I know of for this House or any other legislative body than to determine the rights of its Members to a seat. The Constitution vests in this House the right to judge the qualification of its Members. At the very outset, this committee, both majority and minority members, proceeded in a judicial manner to determine the contest referred to. I have nothing but the highest praise and commendation for my colleagues of the minority of this committee. They gave me at all times the benefit of their vast experience and their knowledge. I found the committee actuated with but one motive and one principle, and that was to decide this case in a judicial manner according to the rules of the House and the law and precedents of the courts of the Nation.

The contest concerns the first district of the State of Oklahoma. That district comprises 10 counties. In eight of the counties the contestant received a majority of the votes cast for Congress in the election of 1930. In but only two of those counties did the contestee receive a majority. On the State returns the contestee received a majority of 463 votes. Each county is subdivided into election precincts, in some counties called election precincts and in others called election wards. Each election precinct has its own election board, which is bipartisan, composed of two members of the Republican Party and two members of the Democratic Party. Each board elects its own chairman. In turn the counties have a county board, which is bipartisan in nature, and each has a chairman elected by its members. The election returns in the first instance are counted by the precinct or ward officials. They are then tallied and the tally sheets, including the ballots, are placed in manila envelopes and forwarded to the county election board, which, under the law of the State of Oklahoma, must retally them and then in turn certify the result to the State officials, and the State election board, or the board of elections, as it is better known in Oklahoma, which board certifies the result of the election. Accordingly the contestee, Mr. Disney, was certified as having been elected a Representative in Congress from the first Oklahoma district. Thereafter, and within due season, the contestant, Mr. O'Connor, filed his notice of contest, and he elaborated numerous charges of fraud, both in the certification by the local officials and in the method of counting the ballots as they were cast in the local precincts or ward election boards.

Briefly his charges may be summed up under this clause, that through misconstruction of the law, through mistake, error, and fraud, ballots were credited, counted, and returned to the county election boards in favor of the contestee which were illegally, mistakenly, and fraudulently counted for him through mistake, error, misconstruction of the law, and fraud.

He alleged that in but two counties this error, this mistake, or this fraud was committed. Those two counties were the county of Tulsa and the county of Ottawa. Now, this is very significant. The district is composed of 10 counties. In 8 of the counties the contestant is satisfied with the vote as tabulated. He had no complaint about any error, misunderstanding of the law, misstatement of the law, or any fraud in those eight counties. They were perfectly all right. He alleges that in the two counties above mentioned there were fraud, undue influence, mistake, and no knowledge of the legal requirements by the local election boards. At least those were his allegations in his first notice of contest. Subsequently he amended his notice of contest and reiterated practically the same allegations, except that he enumerated in greater detail the local precincts wherein he alleged those acts of malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance. On the proof that he took of those allegations in the State of Oklahoma before the duly constituted officials he abandoned his claim in so far as the county of Tulsa was concerned and joined issue on the allegations as to the county of Ottawa. At the hearings before the local officials in the State of Oklahoma I dare say some 150 witnesses were called by the contestant and the contestee. With the exception or the possible exception of but two witnesses there is not a scintilla of evidence in the record to justify the contestant's allegations. There is not one iota of evidence produced by this contestant to substantiate, in the least part, his allegations of fraud, his allegations of the officials' lack of knowledge of the election law, or his allegations of error or misjudgment in the count. But two witnesses testified, in some degree, as to a misunderstanding of the law. Briefly their position is this—and the record substantiates what I say—that, due to a change in the election law of the State of Oklahoma, there was some misunderstanding as to the proper method of counting a split ballot. All of the membership knows what a split ballot is. An elector has voted the straight organization ticket under the organization emblem.

In some States of this Union that may still be done. Then he has crossed over into the opposite column and voted there for some other candidate. For instance, if he voted the straight Democratic ticket under the emblem, he went over to the opposite side, to the column under the Republican emblem, and placed his cross alongside the name of the contestant, and vice versa. In some instances the elector signified his intention of voting the straight Republican ticket, with the exception of the candidate for Congress, and he went over into the Democratic column and placed his cross alongside the name of the contestee.

Those two witnesses testified in full as to what they thought was a misunderstanding. The cross-examination of those witnesses showed clearly that in one or two instances the election officials, when they came to this split ticket, did not know exactly what they should do about it, so they laid it aside, and after they had counted 14 or 15 ballots, the judge of the board came in, and they asked him about it; they asked his advice in the matter. He advised them, after taking a pamphlet containing the law of the State of Oklahoma and reading it to the other three members of the board, he made his decision and correctly decided the correct manner of the count. Immediately the board then went back and started counting, in both instances, all over.

That was the only evidence of any misunderstanding of the election law of the State of Oklahoma.

I was concerned about the matter, because I thought it was generally known how a split ticket should be counted, and I was rather surprised to learn there was somebody in the State of Oklahoma who did not know, or that there was any misunderstanding or confusion about it. I personally examined into that matter. I found that since Oklahoma came into statehood there was absolutely no change in the election law of the State of Oklahoma at all; that the law as it is now and as it was in 1930 is the same law, as far as the counting of split ballots is concerned, as prevailed when Oklahoma came into statehood. That was a bugaboo. That was a bogey-man that was erected by these two supposed election officials. Of the other 148 witnesses, composed of Republicans and Democrats, some Democrats testified in favor of the contestee, and admitted that they voted against him on election day. Now that is significant. Here are Democratic precinct officials, called as witnesses by the contestant, who admitted that they were disloyal to their party and their party candidate in this election.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KENNEDY). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

They admit fratricide to their candidate, but yet they readily concede there was nothing illegal or improper in the count of the vote as cast in their various precincts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What was the result of the election, in so far as the majority obtained by the contestee is concerned?

Mr. GAVAGAN. The contestee received a majority of 468 votes in the two disputed counties.

The contrary of what I have just said is true.

Republicans who voted against their local condidate for Congress, who were members of local election boards, testified on behalf of both contestant and contestee that there was no irregularity either in the counting of the ballots or in the method of accrediting or counting split tickets. The evidence is so replete on that point that the committee was unanimous in its determination there was no merit whatever in the allegations of mistakes, misrepresentations, or fraud in the method of counting split ballots.

What happened to these ballots after this election? As I told you in the beginning, the local precincts or wards made their returns on tally sheets, placed the tally sheets in manila envelopes containing the ballots, and placed the envelopes in boxes and sent them on to the county election boards. The county election boards opened the election boxes and checked the tally sheets and retallied or recertified to the State authorities the result of the county elections for all candidates. It so happened that in 1930 there was an election for local officers; that is, there was a local contest for district judge, and, as I remember, there was a local contest for sheriff. This is where some possible confusion might have occurred. The precinct or ward officials took all the ballots. The local officers were elected on separate ballots. The officials took those ballots, together with the ballots for State officials on which candidates for Congress were listed, and placed them in the same envelope, but certified them on separate tally sheets.

In so far as the only county where there is any contest whatever is concerned, the county of Ottawa, what happened is, that after the recheck of the ballots by the local county board they were placed again into the wooden boxes. In some instances some of the boxes were locked, but wherever the lock was clasped and made solid on those boxes the keys were left dangling from the lock. In other instances they did not even bother about closing the clasp of the lock, but just put the boxes on shelves or tiers of shelves.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that Democratic election officials handled the ballots and the keys in such manner?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I am coming to that. I am glad the gentleman advised me about it. I will reach it in a minute. It is assumed these gentlemen were professed Democrats, at least they had a job under the Democratic organization. Whether they were true Democrats or not, neither the gentleman nor I can answer.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield.

Mr. HOLADAY. Is the report of the committee a unanimous report?

Mr. GAVAGAN. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Is not the gentleman afraid he will stir up some opposition if he discusses the case too much?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I just thought the gentleman might be interested before he was called upon to vote in having an intelligent idea upon what he was voting.

Mr. HOLADAY. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to rely on the committee's unanimous report.

Mr. GAVAGAN. I thank the gentleman. Sometimes, you know, we are afraid of Greeks bearing gifts, and although I am very happy to have the suggestion of the gentleman, I think it wise in order to better perform the duties of chairman reposed in me by the House, to go on and explain the difficulty of the contest in the county of Ottawa.

These election boxes in some instances were locked; in others they were not. They were placed in tiers and left for a period of nine days in the office of the county chairman of the election board, a man by the name of La Motte. The offices of the election board were in La Motte's office.

La Motte had a combination real-estate and insurance office. His offices were located in a combination hotel and office building. Even charwomen had access to the rooms where the ballots were kept for a period of nine days. The elevator boys in the hotel had access to these rooms. A witness who was in the employ of LaMotte in his real estate and brokerage office had access to these ballots and acted in some instances as an official of the election board when, as a matter of fact, he was no official. On the streets of the local town were told many stories of tampering with the ballot boxes. Such is the testimony in the record.

So, accordingly, upon the evidence produced by the contestant himself, he failed to establish any fraud or error in the counting of ballots cast for Representative in Congress, and he failed wholly to show that the sanctity of the ballots in the contested county was properly preserved. By his own proof he established one of two things—either there was an actual tampering with these ballots, or, failing that, there was given full opportunity for a period of nine days to destroy their sanctity.

The committee is unanimous in its opinion that the contestant has failed either to substantiate the allegations of his notice of contest or to establish that the sanctity of the ballots was preserved during that period of nine days. Accordingly, the committee is unanimous in the adoption of the resolution that the contestee retain his seat in the House.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from New York introduce in the RECORD and include in his remarks the full report of the committee on the case?

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein the unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 1288, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

O'CONNOR v. DISNEY

Mr. GAVAGAN, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the following report to accompany contested-election case of Charles O'Connor v. Wesley E. Disney:

We, the undersigned members of the Committee on Elections No. 2, to which committee was referred the contested-election case of Charles O'Connor v. Wesley E. Disney, from the first congressional district of the State of Oklahoma, beg leave to report that after having heard the arguments of counsel for the respective parties and having read the briefs and statements filed herein, and after carefully considering the evidence taken before Hon. John H. Venable, a county judge designated by the contestee, and Hon. John W. Roberts, designated by the contestant, sitting as magistrates pursuant to the laws of the State of Oklahoma, respectfully submit the following:

The contestant, Charles O'Connor, was the Republican candidate and the contestee, Wesley E. Disney, was the Democratic candidate for Representative in Congress from the first congressional district of the State of Oklahoma at an election held November 4, 1930.

The first congressional district of the State of Oklahoma embraces the following 10 counties: Ottawa, Tulsa, Osage, Delaware, Mayes, Nowata, Washington, Craig, Rogers, and Pawnee. According to the official count and canvass of the election returns by the county election boards, respectively, of the above-enumerated counties, which was according to law certified to the State election board of the State of Oklahoma (and in turn canvassed by the said State election board), the State election board found and certified that the contestant, O'Connor, received a total of 41,642 votes and the contestee, Disney, received a total of 41,902 votes, and certified that the contestee was elected Representative by a majority of 260 votes; accordingly a certificate of election was duly issued by the said State board to the contestee, Wesley E. Disney, on the 15th day of November, 1930.

On the 12th day of December, 1930, the contestant, Charles O'Connor, served upon the contestee, Wesley E. Disney, a notice of contest alleging, among other things, the existence of fraud, irregularities, and misconstruction of the election statute in Ottawa and Tulsa Counties, of the first congressional district of the State of Oklahoma. The said original notice was amended by an amended notice of contest served on the contestee on the 15th day of December, 1930, alleging among other things that the precinct election officials in certain precincts of Ottawa County, through misconstruing the law, through mistake, error, and fraud, credited, counted, and returned to the county election board votes in favor of the contestee which were not cast or which were illegally, mistakenly, and fraudulently counted for him, and that the said precinct election officials, through mistake, error, misconstruction of the law, and fraud failed to count for the contestant votes to which he was entitled, making in all a difference of 607 votes.

Similar allegations were made in reference to certain precincts and precinct officials in Tulsa County of the first congressional district, whereby the contestant was alleged to have been deprived of not less than 155 votes. The contestee duly served a written answer to the notice of contest, averring allegations in general denial of those contained in the notice of contest, and among other things specifically alleging that in certain precincts of Ottawa County the ballot boxes for a long period of time after they were delivered to the county election officials were left unprotected and afforded opportunity of being tampered with, and that should a recount be had, that any change found in the said ballots would be the result of tampering by persons unlawfully entering the boxes long after the precinct officers had certified their returns, and the county returns had gone to the State election board. Subsequently the depositions of numerous witnesses were taken on behalf of the contestant and the contestee before Hon. John H. Venable, a county judge of the State of Oklahoma designated by the contestee, and Hon. John W. Roberts, designated by the contestant.

The following contains a reference to the testimony of the numerous witnesses called by the contestant and the contestee, and shows the precincts in Ottawa County complained of by the contestant and the page number where the testimony in reference thereto may be found in the record of the testimony:

In the consideration of the evidence in the whole case, your committee has been guided by the following postulates deemed established by law and the rules and precedents of the House of Representatives:

I. The official returns are prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of official action.

II. The burden of coming forward with evidence to meet or resist the presumption of regularity rests with the contestant.

III. That to entitle a contestant in an election case to an examination of the ballots, he must establish (a) that some fraud, mistake, or error has been practiced or committed whereby the result of the election was incorrect, and a recount would produce a result contrary to the official returns; (b) that the ballots since the election have been so rigorously preserved that there has been no reasonable opportunity for tampering with them.

DISCUSSION OF THE EVIDENCE

COUNTING OF THE BALLOTS

Both the contestant and the contestee called numerous witnesses, all of whom for the most part were precinct election officials engaged in the general election that is the subject of this contest, and as the precinct boards are nonpartisan, these witnesses represented about evenly, members of the Republican and Democratic Parties. With the possible exception of but two of the many witnesses called, the testimony conclusively established that the precinct boards were duly and properly instructed as to the election law of the State of Oklahoma; as to the manner and method of counting ballots and especially split ballots; that in some instances questions arose when a counter would pick up a split ballot, and thereupon the judge of the board would consult the law and properly instruct the counters and watchers as to the principles governing the counting of the ballots. The evidence on this point is so overwhelming that the majority of your committee is convinced that all ballots were properly and duly counted, and that the contestant has wholly failed to establish the burden of proof of any mistake in the method of counting of the ballots.

CARE AND PRESERVATION OF THE BALLOTS

The evidence established that each election precinct board at the close of the election placed the paper ballots in folders together with a tally sheet of the votes cast, which, in turn, were placed in wooden boxes, and sent the boxes to the office of the county election board located in a combination hotel and office building; part of the offices were used as a real-estate and insurance office by the witness Lloyd La Motte, then secretary of the county election board. Each ballot box was placed upon a shelf, and in some instances the keys opening the locks thereon were left dangling from the boxes, and in other instances the keys were kept in an unlocked drawer. The testimony of the witness La Motte and the witness Corkins (pp. 94, 154, 82, 94 et seq. of the record) is to the effect that several persons had keys to the outside office of the place where the ballot boxes were kept, and the witness La Motte testified to the fact that rumors of tampering with the ballot boxes were prevalent on the streets for a period of days after the election. This condition of easy access to the ballots continued for a period of nine days after the election, before they were removed to a place of safety and preservation.

The evidence as to the lack of care and preservation of the ballots and ballot boxes for a period of nine days is so clear and undisputed that one is impelled to the inference that the ballots were in fact tampered with or that there existed a grave possibility of having been tampered with. Furthermore, the witnesses Corkins and La Motte, called on behalf of the contestant, testified to an absolute bribery of the witness La Motte by one Cuddie Davidson, a former local judge in Ottawa County. According to the evidence of the witness La Motte, he was visited at his home late on the evening following the general election by Judge Davidson, and in the course of a conversation Davidson proposed a proposition whereby La Motte, the secretary of the county election board, was to absent himself from the county for a period of time to afford Davidson or his agents an opportunity to open the ballot boxes and change the votes cast in the election for sheriff of said county, which ballots were contained in the same ballot boxes as the ballots cast for Representative. In order to carry this scheme to completion, La Motte testified, Davidson gave him a roll of bills; that the roll was a large one, but he did not know the exact amount.

The witness Corkins testified that Davidson came to his home on the same evening, told him of his proposition to La Motte; that La Motte himself later that evening told him of Davidson's proposition, and that he (Corkins) advised against the carrying out of the scheme. Accordingly, La Motte subsequently returned the roll of bills to Davidson, and the scheme was supposed to have been abandoned. It should be borne in mind that the witness La Motte testified that rumors were prevalent for several days after the election about tampering with the ballot boxes; that people in the street were talking about it; with this in mind, the testimony of these two witnesses as to bribery or attempted bribery on the part of Davidson is significant and suggestive of the inference that something was wrong; that the ballots and ballot boxes were or might have been tampered with, and compels the conclusion that these ballots and ballot boxes were not protected to the degree that their sanctity was preserved, as is required by the well-settled rules of law and the precedents and rules of the House of Representatives.

In People v. Livingston (79 N. Y. 279) the court said:

"They (the returns) may be impeached for fraud or mistake, but in attempting to remedy one evil we should be cautious not to open the door to another and far greater evil. After the election it is known just how many votes are required to change the result. The ballots themselves can not be identified. They have no earmark. Everything depends upon keeping the ballot boxes secure. * * * Every consideration of public policy, as well as the ordinary rules of evidence, require that the party offering this evidence should establish the fact that the ballots are genuine. It is not sufficient that a mere possibility of security is proved, but the fact must be shown with reasonable certainty. If the boxes have been rigorously preserved, the ballots are the best and highest evidence; but if not, they are not only the weakest but the most dangerous evidence. * * * Where ballots in an envelope sealed with the village seal are put by the village clerk in an unlocked desk containing also the village seal, and situated in a room exposed to the public, and the envelope is partly torn by some unknown person while it remained in such desk, the ballots are not better evidence of the result of the election than the returns of the judges."

In the opinion of the majority of your committee the record in this case is barren of any competent proof tending to show or establish fraud, mistake, or error in either the counting of the ballots cast or the official returns of the vote in the general election held in November, 1930, in Ottawa County of the first congressional district of Oklahoma; that said record is sterile of proof of the safeguarding of the ballots after the said election, but contrarywise, is pregnant with positive evidence that said ballots were, for a 9-day period subsequent to said election, available, accessible, and perhaps subjected to public interference or private tampering; that the proof of such accessibility is so compelling as to give rise to a reasonable presumption that the sanctity of said ballots was indeed violated, the true result of the election falsified, and the will of the electorate defeated, thwarted, or destroyed. Consequently, the majority of your committee believes that a recount of ballots cast in the said election would destroy the will of the electorate, defeat the true result of said election, and visit grave injustice on the duly elected Representative from said district.

We therefore submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Wesley E. Disney was elected a Representative in the Seventy-second Congress from the first congressional district in the State of Oklahoma, and is entitled to a seat as such Representative."

JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN, Chairman.
JOHN J. DOUGLASS.
LINDSAY C. WARREN.
JOHN H. OVERTON.
WILLIAM P. COLE, Jr.
O. H. CROSS.

We dissent in portion of finding of fact in last paragraph but concur in conclusions.

C. B. MCCLINTOCK.
CHARLES E. SWANSON.

After a careful and thorough study of the evidence in this case and citations called to the committee's attention, and a study of the precedents of the House in connection therewith, and with a particular of the most recent precedent in the case of Kunz v. Granata, I must, as a member of this committee, advise the House that Wesley E. Disney is entitled to his seat from the first congressional district of Oklahoma. I, however, do not concur in the entire statement made by the majority of the committee, and at the proper time, if necessary, will advise the House of my reasons therefor.

There are many points of similarity involved in the case of Kunz v. Granata and this case of O'Connor v. Disney. If we were to follow the latest precedent of the House, to wit, that established in the case of Kunz v. Granata, I could not but reach a conclusion that the recount requested by O'Connor should be granted and the committee be bound by the result thereof.

The decision in the case of Kunz v. Granata, in my judgment, is wholly erroneous, not being based on good judgment and facts nor well-established precedents of the House, but without question a purely partisan decision. I, therefore, must necessarily disregard any and all phases of this latest precedent of the House in order to come to a proper decision in the instant case.

As a Member of the House and of one of its Committees on Elections, I am happy indeed to join with the majority in recommending the seating of Wesley E. Disney, and thereby establish a later precedent which will remove from consideration by future Congresses the ill-advised, ill-considered, and indefensible partisan precedent established in the case of Kunz v. Granata. There is no doubt, considering all precedents other than the Kunz-Granata precedent, but that the evidence in the instant case justifies the seating of Disney.

JOHN C. SCHAFER.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, after a careful and thorough study of the evidence in this case and citations called to the committee's attention and a study of the precedents of the House in connection therewith, and with a particular study of the most recent precedent in the case of Kunz against Granata, I must, as a member of the Elections Committee, advise the House that Wesley E. Disney is entitled to his seat from the first congressional district of Oklahoma. I, however, do not concur in the entire statement made by the majority of the committee.

There are many points of similarity involved in the case of Kunz against Granata and this case of O'Connor against Disney. If we were to follow the latest precedent of the House, to wit, that established in the case of Kunz against Granata, I could not but reach a conclusion that the recount requested by O'Connor should be granted and the committee be bound by the result thereof.

The decision in the case of Kunz against Granata, in my judgment, is wholly erroneous, not being based on good judgment and facts, nor well-established precedents of the House, but without question is a purely partisan decision. I therefore must necessarily disregard any and all phases of this latest precedent of the House in order to come to a proper decision in the instant case.

As a Member of the House and one of its Committees on Elections, I am happy indeed to join with the majority in recommending the seating of Wesley E. Disney and thereby establish a later precedent which will remove from the consideration of future Congresses the ill-advised, ill-considered, and indefensible partisan precedent established in the case of Kunz against Granata. [Applause.] There is no doubt, considering all precedents other than the Kunz-Granata precedent, but that the evidence in the instant case justifies the seating of Disney.

Mr. Speaker, after reading page 4 of the report of the majority in this pending contest you might reach the conclusion that the Committee on Elections took the action it has taken by reason of some alleged tampering and bribery on the part of Republicans in behalf of the Republican contestant, Mr. O'Connor. On page 4 of the report of the majority you will find that a former judge conspired, or is accused of conspiring, with an election official, an election official who had the custody of these ballots during the period of time in which it has been maintained they have not been preserved in full integrity. Certainly the House should know that the former judge who was going to tamper with those ballots was not a Republican and not a henchman of the Republican contestant, Mr. O'Connor. Certainly, Mr. Davidson, the former judge who is accused of bribery and of making it possible not to preserve these ballots in their full integrity, is not a Republican. The evidence before the committee shows that he is none other than a former Democratic judge from the State of Oklahoma, and the election official having custody of the ballots, with whom he is accused of conspiring, is not a Republican and not a henchman of Mr. O'Connor, but he is a Democratic election official, selected by the Democratic Party.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. GAVAGAN. The gentleman will concede that the judge to whom he directs his remarks is an ex-Democratic judge.

Mr. SCHAFER. An ex-Democrat, certainly, and there is no evidence in the record which indicates that he turned Republican overnight in the same way that some of our friends in Texas did in the last presidential election.

There is no evidence whatever to show that he attempted to tamper with the congressional ballots, directly or indirectly. This Democratic judge was trying to change ballots in the sheriffs' race in favor of the Democratic sheriff candidate.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five additional minutes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to some legislation which should be enacted in the future, and which really should be enacted before this session of Congress adjourns. What we really need is a joint committee, composed of several members of all of the election committees of the House, to make a study and formulate regular policies, principles, rules, and procedure which the election committees in the future and Members of the House will follow in these contested-election cases. I know that in the closing days of this session it will be impossible to complete that study.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. GAVAGAN. I have the utmost respect for the gentleman, both as a Member of this House and as a member of this committee, and I have greater respect for the fairness and lawyer-like attitude—in spite of the fact that the gentleman is not a lawyer—which the gentleman exhibited in reaching a decision in connection with this case. The gentleman knows that both he and I have discussed the wisdom of introducing a resolution in the House which will prohibit a recount of ballots in a contested election by any State official known as a notary public.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. I believe every Member of our committee feels as we do about it, and that being so, I think the leaders of this House should speed the enactment of legislation which will prohibit a recount by a notary public henchman of a defeated candidate, as in the case of Kunz against Granata. It is unthinkable that such a henchman should have the custody of ballots and make the recount for Congress while the opponent who has perhaps been legally elected and has his certificate of election is in Washington, thousands of miles away, attending to the people's business. [Applause.] It is not only unthinkable but ridiculous. All of the precedents in the House indicate that before a recount should be had in a contested-election case, where a Member has been issued a certificate of election and is seated, that some reasonable evidence must be presented to indicate irregularity or fraud. I frankly confess that I could not find sufficient evidence of fraud or irregularity in this contest to justify calling for the ballot boxes in Ottawa County and counting the ballots. Of course, if I had followed the latest decision in the case of Kunz against Granata I would have had no hesitation in recommending that the ballots be called for and recounted because in that case a political appointee of the contestant was permitted to issue a subpœna duces tecum and have the ballots in a room where many different people had their hands on them, where they were subjected to the possibility of fraud right under the nose of the notary public, who, under your decision in that case, was acting, a thousand miles away, as the Congress of the United States for the purpose of authorizing and carrying on the recount.

I do not believe it is necessary to take up very much more time on this contest; but when you consider the report of the majority, bear in mind that there is not one scintilla of evidence in the hearings or in the records indicating that Mr. O'Connor or anyone acting for or on behalf of him has attempted to bring about any fraud, either in the count of the ballots or tampering with the ballots after they had been placed in the custody of the Democratic election officials. All allegations and evidence of fraud in the case refer to the sheriff's contest, and in behalf of a Democratic candidate for that office. Of course, if they have the kind of Democrats in Oklahoma that the record would seem to indicate, perhaps some of the Democratic leaders in Oklahoma who might have been trying to make hay while the sun shines and to benefit themselves would sell out one of their own candidates and change the ballots in favor of a Republican. This would have to be the state of affairs if we were to infer that the ballots had been tampered with in behalf of the Republican contestant, Mr. O'Connor.

I hope this resolution will be adopted by unanimous vote and that we may have a decision in this case based on facts, justice, and well-established precedents, and in this way add to the precedents of the House and remove from future consideration in election contests the indefensible, partisan decision in the case of Kunz against Granata, with respect to the policy and authority of the Congress in reference to recounting ballots in election contests. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether it would be in order to move to dispense with further discussion and proceed to action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN], has control of the time.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I may say for the benefit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] that we have only one more speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS].

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would gladly accede to the request of the gentleman from New York if I were in position to do so; but, considering the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, just made, a word or two in explanation of the real meaning of this decision of your committee is necessary.

May I state that the committee was not interested in whether the officers who were liable to suspicion were Democrats or Republicans. Whoever they were, their actions showed them to be political renegades. I may say further that there would never have been a contest in this case but for the fact there was a previous dispute over the contest for sheriff in this same county of Ottawa. There was a recount carried on with respect to the contest for sheriff in Ottawa County, and the Republican unseated the Democrat. Learning this, Mr. O'Connor, the contestant, our former esteemed Member, thought that he would have a chance upon a recount for Congressman and for this reason gave notice of contest and claimed a recount. However, there was a great distinction. Your committee was influenced by the fact that the ballot on which the election of a sheriff in Ottawa County depended was a separate ballot and not connected in any way with the congressional ballot. So that even if it had been shown to the committee that there were errors in the ballots for sheriff, that, of course, would have no bearing upon the congressional ballots. The only argument that Mr. O'Connor had for a recount at all was that there had been errors in counting the separate county ballots and therefore it must follow there were errors in counting the congressional ballots, which, of course, was a contention that no judicial mind could entertain. Then the question arose that even if this were not the case, and even if the fact of errors in connection with the fight for the county office should be considered in the congressional contest, then the question would immediately arise whether the ballots in the congressional contest were properly preserved.

The evidence presented to your committee showed they were not properly preserved, and this evidence, unwittingly, came from the contestant himself. The evidence showed that the congressional ballots were kept in a hotel room which was also used as a real-estate office and the ballots were open and exposed to anybody who came into that room and your committee felt that in consideration of all the evidence, the ballots were not properly preserved and therefore could not be recounted.

Let me say, in conclusion, that upon the admission now of the gentleman from Wisconsin, this becomes a unanimous report from the Committee on Elections No. 2. I have had the pleasure and honor of serving upon this committee for eight years. The reports of the committee have always been fair and nonpartisan and have always been adopted by the House. In this instance, regardless of party affiliations, we have tried to regard this particular contest from purely a judicial standpoint, and from such a standpoint the committee has decided unanimously that Mr. Disney is entitled to his seat in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF KENT v. COYLE

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 234

Contested-election case of Kent v. Coyle

Resolved, That Everett Kent was not elected a Representative to the Seventy-second Congress from the thirtieth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That William R. Coyle was a duly elected Representative to the Seventy-second Congress from the thirtieth district of the State of Pennsylvania, and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO OF THE PENSION BILL

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the President's harsh denunciation of Congress in his veto message of the last omnibus pension bill that was brought before the House by a unanimous report of the Committee on Pensions, and which was passed unanimously by the House and Senate, and because of the fact that the committee intends to call up in the next few days another omnibus pension bill, I think it only fair to the House and the country to state some of the facts that warranted the report of and the passage by Congress of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say in the beginning, that since the first pension laws were passed, Congress has realized that a general law could not be passed that would cover all meritorious pension cases. The Congress has reserved to itself the right to pass on cases, which were in their opinion meritorious, but which could not be granted under the general law. This right has never been delegated to any bureau. It has reserved this right and has been exercising it for more than 100 years. It has never yet intimated that it desired to transfer the right to pass on the merits of claims of this kind to any other authority, and especially to bureaus created by Congress. The Pension Committee has adopted a set of rules with regard to the class of claims that would be considered by the committee, and a copy of these rules has been annually placed in the hands of the Members. In order to set aside any rule of the committee, a vote of two-thirds of the membership of the committee is required. When a bill is reported, a full and complete history, giving all the facts in each case is printed with the report, giving the House an opportunity to know just what the committee has reported. For the past 10 years, to my knowledge, and I do not know how much longer, these bills have been passed under unanimous consent, where any one Member can prevent their passage. I state this to show that nothing is brought to the House by the committee, without giving the membership every opportunity to inform themselves of the work of the committee.

This plan has been in operation for a long time. I am unable to say how long, but certainly ever since the present President has been an occupant of the White House, and it is strange that he has just learned that the Congress had been passing such vicious legislation. Certainly, not on account of the present bill, because the items in this bill have been passed almost entirely on precedents of past committees of Congress, and a number of precedents have been abolished. I am saying this because the President's veto message of the omnibus bill H. R. 9575 undoubtedly needs explanation, as it would give the impression to the country at large that Congress is passing vicious legislation for veterans, their wives and orphans. This false impression to the country at large has its purpose. It is criticism of Congress, and especially the Pension Committees of the House and Senate. The House Committee on Pensions can justify the action taken on the bills which were included in the omnibus bill. This veto message raises objection to four items of the House bill. The other remaining 10 items were from the Senate. This message contains statements which are very misleading to the public, and undoubtedly were intended as a political club to wave over the heads of Congress by creating a sentiment among the people against pensions and giving a false impression. In the President's message he states that a proposed pension was to a man who was discharged without honor because of chronic alcoholism. This is as far as he goes on that statement. He has pointed out the fact, which in itself appears to be a disgrace for Congress to pass relief for a veteran of this kind.

However, he has failed to state all facts in the case, especially the extenuating circumstances surrounding this particular case. He further remarks that he will "cite instances in the bill and give the facts in the case." This he does not do. He suppresses the main facts in the case. The most vicious statements contained in the report have been mentioned and the rest of the facts are eliminated. The Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives acts as a court of equity and considers private bills for soldiers, widows, and orphans who for some reason are denied relief under the existing laws because of a purely legal or medical technicality which Congress, in their judgment, could properly set aside as a matter of equity and justice. Only a small percentage of the bills presented to the Committee on Pensions are enacted into law. Very careful consideration is given each bill introduced before the committee, and should favorable action be taken, you can rest assured that it has been shown by evidence that there are circumstances and equities to the case sufficient for Congress to grant relief. Before action is taken the complete files of the department are transmitted to the committee. In addition to this evidence they have a report from the War Department, Navy Department, with additional evidence furnished by the claimant. A careful study is made of all the facts in the case, and each bill before the House Committee on Pensions is acted upon by a full committee and not by a report from a subcommittee.

To go back to the first objection by the President of the discharge for chronic alcoholism, the facts in this case are that the soldier served during the war with Spain for a period of 11 months, when he was discharged on a surgeon's certificate of disability. The reason given was chronic alcoholism. The War Department holds this discharge to be one without honor and not dishonorable. There is a vital difference between a discharge without honor and one which is dishonorable. This veteran is 61 years of age, owns no property, and has no income, and is in indigent circumstances, and is physically unable to earn his support by manual labor. Under existing laws a Spanish-American War veteran who rendered the same service and under the same circumstances, but was fortunate enough to have obtained an honorable discharge for these conditions instead of one without honor, can file his claim for pension direct in the department, and undoubtedly would receive a pension of $60 per month. Congress by virtue of their action passed the Spanish War act of June 2, 1930, which eliminated vicious habits and specific diseases as a factor in title to pension. This being true, the committee was fully justified from an equitable and charitable standpoint of extending some relief, and in this particular case recommended that he be granted a pension at the rate of $6 per month, the minimum amount allowed.

Another objection raised by the President "was one in which a proposed pension to a widow whose claim was filed five years after the death of the veteran, and upon call having been made of evidence of legal widowhood, claimant abandoned her claim for a period of 25 years. A recent investigation indicates that the claimant was never the legal widow of the soldier." This statement in itself is not sufficient. The facts in the case are different. The committee found, first, that claimant's husband rendered service in the Mexican War in 1847 and 1848, when he was honorably discharged.

The claimant is past 95 years of age, owns no property, has no income, and is in indigent circumstances. Further, it is shown that the claimant lived with the soldier as man and wife for over 30 years prior to his death, and, in fact, raised a family. Further, the law of the State in which the soldier and claimant resided recognized a common-law marriage. The department in this case held that ex parte evidence appears to have established the facts of cohabitation with the veteran for many years before his death. The ceremonial marriage of the soldier and claimant alleged was not shown and could not be shown, as all witnesses to marriage were dead. Hearsay evidence was furnished in the case tending to show a former marriage of soldier. No true evidence of this fact has been furnished; and, if evidence had been furnished, such former wife of soldier was not known by name and had never been heard of from 1878, and the presumption would have been, after seven years of unexplained absence, that she was dead; and even then common-law marriage by soldier and claimant could arise in the State in which soldier and claimant resided; and, in view of all the circumstances involved in this case, the committee was fully justified in presuming that a common-law marriage did exist, and for that reason claimant was given a pension at the rate of $30 per month. One of the examiners in the bureau stated to me that had this old woman cooperated with the investigator, she probably would have been given a pension. How could this very aged woman past 95 years cooperate?

The above statement of facts has been given to show to what extent the committee has gone into the facts of the claim to determine whether there were sufficient circumstances to warrant equitable consideration of the claim and had the President stated the facts and circumstances in his veto message, as have been set forth in this explanation, which is the record in the case named, undoubtedly the people of the country would not labor under the false impression that Congress is passing vicious legislation for veterans and their dependents. All of the other cases cited are similar to the above.

The omnibus bill contained 367 items and would increase the annual cost to the Government approximately $50,000 per year, which amount would decrease as these old veterans and their widows were dropped from the rolls momentarily because of death or remarriage. There is a greater reason back of this veto message than the mere fact that there were 14 objectionable items contained in approximately 400 bills. These items which have been pointed out by the President would cost approximately $2,200 per year. This objection was not made from an economy standpoint. It was vetoed to create a sentiment throughout the country against equitable adjustment for veterans' legislation, and especially in the form of private bills, this sentiment to be used to deny more important legislation than this mere omnibus bill, which would cost approximately $50,000 per year. If it had been vetoed from an economy standpoint, it would have been far cheaper for the President to have signed the bill than to have vetoed it, especially if he objected to only 14 items. If a careful study is given to the fact as to the cost which is being placed upon the taxpayers of the country because of this veto message, it will readily be seen that this cost alone for the consideration of this veto message would have paid these controverted items for many years.

The severe criticism of the House and Senate by the President in this message is very unjust, as the message itself is very misleading. Approximately 400 Members of the House and Senate have private bills in this omnibus bill, representing districts of all States of the United States. These bills were introduced in good faith by Members of Congress and Senators, they believing that they were meritorious bills and that they were sufficient equities to warrant recognition by Congress. This message is an obvious attempt to abolish private bills for pensions, which, in fact, would nullify the standing committees of the House and Senate. It is now placed squarely to the membership of the House to determine at this time whether they wish to retain or surrender this function to an executive bureau, or to continue to reserve the right to themselves to pass on the merits of cases which could not be granted under the general law, or to now delegate this authority to a bureau created by them. This statement has been made to the membership of this House in rebuttal of the attack upon the membership of Congress and the committee, and to show that misleading statements were presented in the veto message presented to Congress.

In closing, I want to say that I am convinced that the President would not have written such a message if he had been correctly informed. Quoting from his message:

> I cite some instances in the bill, without mentioning names, the facts as to which have been furnished me by the Government agencies.

This being true, if any Government agency furnished such data as he quoted, it ought to be abolished, or the person, who is responsible for such suppression of the facts, which is worse than a misrepresentation, ought to be summarily dismissed from the executive service.

Another phase of the message, which shows ignorance on the part of some one is—

> Most of these undeserving cases have been previously rejected by the Pension Bureau as having no sound basis upon which to construe any obligation in equity for the granting of special benefits.

In the first place, no case is ever considered by the Pension Committee until it has been rejected by the bureau. In the second place, the Pension Bureau has no authority, under the law, to pass on any "obligation in equity" in granting pensions. Their business is only to pass on the legality of cases coming before them. Hence, the message again unfairly and unjustly attacks Congress, because some one appears to be ignorant of the duties and business of the bureau and also what Congress has reserved to itself and what it has delegated to a bureau, established by Congress to assist Congress in its labors, rather than have the bureau dictate to Congress.

As I have stated, the committee expects to call up in the next day or two another omnibus bill. A full report of each and every case contained in this omnibus bill is now available to the membership of the House. I hope that every Member will get a copy of this report and familiarize himself or herself with the facts in each case.

I wish further to state for the benefit of the House that the committee has had the Director of Pensions of the Veterans' Bureau go over carefully each of these cases with it, and the Director of Pensions of the Veterans' Bureau has stated to the committee that he approves of the equities and the amounts contained in each item carried in the bill.

RECORD IN CONGRESS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes and permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have asked the indulgence of this House to speak during general debate to-day in order to give my views on important legislation—past, pending, and prospective—and problems before the Congress.

CRITICS UNFAIR

This Congress has had many perplexing problems, harder to deal with than the public realizes. We have been criticized severely for inaction, big appropriations, high taxes, and failure to produce prosperity. Much of this criticism is unjust and many of those who criticize fail to place the responsibility where it belongs. They give no credit to those of us who have labored and voted for the people's interests, but who have been outnumbered by Congressmen and a President with opposite views.

CONGRESS IS CUTTING APPROPRIATIONS

Critics fail to recognize the actual good Congress is doing. They never mention, for instance, the saving of $600,000,000 this Congress has already made by cutting appropriations from what they were a year ago. They never mention the fact that Congress actually cut $161,000,000 from the Budget estimates approved by President Hoover in spite of the fact that all members of the President's Cabinet and heads of all bureaus and commissions appeared before the Subcommittee on Appropriations and vigorously opposed every proposed reduction. Some critics even try to deny the fact that the Members of Congress voted a reduction of our own salaries and those of all Government employees in the face of a storm of opposition from the President and Federal employees from all over the country. No doubt the Congress will make more drastic reductions before adjournment.

MY RECORD IN CONGRESS FOR THE PEOPLE

I believe in fair play and I propose to acquaint the people of my district with my record in Congress. They have reelected me twice with increasing and overwhelming majorities, and I have tried to show my appreciation by my stand on all matters affecting their welfare. I have consistently and vigorously opposed special-interests legislation for and by Wall Street and the international bankers. I feel that the people of my district will indorse my stand, but whether they do or not they are entitled to my record in Congress.

AGAINST HAWLEY-SMOOT TARIFF ACT

Two years ago I vigorously opposed and voted against the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act, the most outrageous, unfair, and unscientific tariff law ever enacted in the history of the United States. It has robbed the American farmer of hundreds of millions of dollars, has caused practically every nation on the face of the earth to retaliate against the United States, and has closed the world markets to our products. This high tariff law has added much to our economic troubles. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the present tariff laws in all fairness to our farmers should be repealed.

AGAINST MORATORIUM

Early in the present session I voted against the moratorium on foreign war debts due this country, on the ground that it would lead to ultimate cancellation. I felt it was a measure that would "rob Peter to pay Paul," or, in other words, rob the Government in order to make it possible for the international bankers to collect that money in payment of private debts due them from the same foreign countries. I thought then and believe now that if moratoriums are in order, they should begin at home with some of our poor farmers and others who are losing their homes.

AGAINST $2,000,000,000 FINANCE CORPORATION

I voted against the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and stated on the floor of the House that that money should be used to pay the soldiers' bonus due our World War veterans instead of to Wall Street bankers and big interests. The recent loans made to railroads from this fund were immediately used to pay off mortgages to Morgan & Co., leaving the United States "holding the sack." In my opinion it is only a matter of time until the Government will have to take over those railroads in their run-down condition, thus relieving J. P. Morgan instead of the tax-burdened farmer and small business man.

FOR SOLDIER BONUS

The huge appropriation for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was largely responsible for the defeat in the committee recently of the soldiers' bonus bill. I am for the Patman bill especially, because it provides for expansion of the currency and requires no bond issue to increase the public debt or impair the gold reserve. The bonus money of over $2,000,000,000 would be spent in every nook and corner of the country, reach the common people, increase the buying power of the public, and revive business generally throughout the United States.

FOR EXCISE TAX ON IMPORTED CRUDE OIL AND COAL

During my time here I have urged a tariff or excise tax of $1 a barrel on imported oil. I am opposed to the importation of cheap foreign crude oil produced by foreign labor in competition with our independent operators of America. I supported the compromise 42 cents per barrel excise tax on oil on the ground that "half a loaf is better than no loaf at all," but insisted at the time that the tax should be at least doubled to 84 cents a barrel. This would mean much, not only to the independent operators of Oklahoma but to thousands of farmers and royalty owners of the United States. Largely for the same reason I supported a tax on imported coal.

AGAINST GENERAL SALES TAX

I am unalterably opposed to a general sales tax and have no apologies to make for my position on that unjust tax that would have heaped $600,000,000 on the backs of our tax-burdened people, who are in no way responsible for the Treasury deficit. I felt that I would betray the confidence of the people of my district if I voted for a general sales tax.

FOR ECONOMY LEGISLATION

Not only in the present session but in every Congress in which I have had the honor to serve, I have advocated and voted for the most rigid economy at every opportunity. I have voted for every legitimate economy item that has come before the present session. I voted to reduce my own salary and office expenses. I voted to combine the Army and Navy under one department. That item alone would have saved around $100,000,000 per year, but was defeated largely by lobbyists consisting of Cabinet members and a private secretary from the White House.

I voted to cut $24,000,000 from the Army appropriation and am confident it could stand a still further cut without impairing the efficiency of our standing Army. I voted to cut over $200,000,000 from the top-heavy departments of Government below what the President and his army of so-called experts told Congress it would take for them to function.

FOR TAXES BASED ON ABILITY TO PAY

Besides this, I advocated and voted for those provisions of the House revenue bill, raising income taxes to practically war-time basis, believing that taxes should be based upon ability to pay. I have urged that the surtax and gift tax be drastically increased. I also supported the House provision taxing Wall Street stock gamblers. I have been amazed at the audacity of the White House in yielding to Wall Street demands that this small tax on all sales of stock exchanges be eliminated from the bill. A tax of 1 per cent on sales of Wall Street stock gamblers would amount to approximately $400,000,000 per year, and would go far toward balancing the Federal Budget.

FOR ORIGINAL FARM MARKETING ACT

I supported the original farm marketing act, as I am a firm believer in cooperative and orderly marketing. I reluctantly voted to permit the President to name a Farm Board to carry out the provisions of the act. It was, however, a recognition of the farmer, and I was hopeful that some good might come from it, but to my chagrin and surprise, Alexander Legge, head of the Harvester Trust, was appointed by the President as head of the Farm Board. While the Harvester Trust sent millions of dollars' worth of farm machinery to Russia that was responsible in a great measure for the unusual increase in Russia's cotton and wheat crops to flood the world markets in competition with American farmers, Mr. Legge, as chairman of the Farm Board, gave out frequent interviews warning the American farmers to reduce the acreage of their wheat and cotton.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am much interested in the gentleman's remarks, especially his reference to the farm marketing act. Does not the gentleman think that the present farm marketing act ought to be amended?

FARMERS SHOULD BE GUARANTEED COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes. Replying further to my colleague from Oklahoma, will say I am convinced that the marketing act should be amended in a manner that will guarantee to the farmers the cost of actual production. A bill for this purpose is now pending in Congress and has the indorsement of the Farmers Union, the Grange, and other farm organizations. I shall oppose the adjournment of the present session of Congress until some such progressive and remedial farm legislation is enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I will.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I have listened with interest to the gentleman's speech. I agree with what he said a few moments ago about economy, and also agree that he placed the responsibility where it belongs.

REPUBLICANS IN CONTROL

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I thank the gentleman.

Let me also remind you, the Congress, and country that it is the Republican ox that is in the ditch. Republicans have been in complete control for the past 10 years. Wanton extravagance and shortsightedness of the Republican administration have brought the country to this unhappy and crucial hour. During the three years of the present administration innumerable boards and commissions have been appointed until it has become a standing joke. During all that time not so much as a feeble whisper came from the White House urging economy. But now that the country is faced with a $3,000,000,000 deficit because of doles to big business, especially the international bankers, who have had their worthless bonds underwritten by the Federal Treasury as the main part of the President's so-called constructive program, the President suddenly becomes solicitous that Congress economize.

WILL STAND ON RECORD

Let me again say in conclusion that I have supported every meritorious measure of economy during my five years in Congress. I have not hesitated to vote my conscientious convictions on all occasions. I have not side-stepped nor evaded any issue. On that record I am willing to stand or fall. [Applause.]

UNITED STATES ROANOKE COLONY COMMISSION

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up privileged House Resolution 172.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. Con. Res. 26, to establish a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke Colony Commission.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes—to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Library—the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution, and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that anything of a controversial matter was going to come up this afternoon. This is the beginning of another celebration that will lead to a considerable expense. If we are going to take the matter up this afternoon, I think we should have a quorum present so that everyone will understand exactly what is under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. POU. There will be no expense attached to this, as I understand it.

Mr. SNELL. Surely the gentleman from North Carolina does not mean to say that there will be no expense attached to the resolution.

Mr. POU. I refer the gentleman from New York to the author of the resolution, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. SNELL. I would rather have it referred to some one, but when we start a commission as formidable as this, it means expense to the Federal Government. That is the reason for the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to briefly explain?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. This resolution calls for a committee of three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate to report back to Congress on December 15 the advisability of Federal contribution and Federal participation in the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of English-speaking civilization on the American Continent. It is, therefore, the oldest celebration in which we can participate. I do not hesitate in stating to the gentleman from New York and to the membership of the House that we expect only a very modest contribution on the part of Congress. If this commission should come in here with any extravagant plan for the celebration or calling for any large appropriation, I assure the gentleman from New York that I would personally oppose it.

Mr. SNELL. I have been on the floor during the last few years when we have started about a half dozen of these celebrations, and I know exactly what it has done and how it is done and what it eventually leads to. Has the gentleman any idea whatever but that this commission will report favorably upon having this celebration?

Mr. WARREN. I hope the commission will so report, but I hope they will also ask for a very small contribution.

Mr. SNELL. At the present time under present conditions I individually shall have to oppose this resolution if it is to be called up this afternoon. We shall have to have a quorum here and I shall have to get a record vote on starting a commission at this time.

Mr. WARREN. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Committee on Rules unanimously reported the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. It has never come to my attention until now. I do not think this is any time to start any new celebration when we are giving our entire attention to economy and balancing the Budget.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. If I have the floor.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has the Economy Committee favorably acted upon this resolution? That committee has usurped the duty and jurisdiction of all of the standing committees.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order that there is no quorum present.

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 235 (Rept. No. 1408)

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a special committee to be composed of five Members for the purpose of investigating Government competition with private enterprise and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation. The committee shall report to the House not later than December 15, 1932, the result of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the United States whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpœna or otherwise, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary, and such expenses thereof shall be paid on vouchers ordered by said committee and approved by the chairman thereof. Subpœnas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman and shall be served by any person designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Resolution 235, which I have just sent to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Resolution 235, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask the gentleman from North Carolina why it is that our special Economy Committee, headed by the majority whip of the House, can not handle this matter just as well as a new committee and save all the overhead expense of an additional committee?

Mr. POU. It is not within the province of the Economy Committee to handle a matter of this kind.

Mr. BLANTON. It is already organized, it already has its overhead, personnel, and machinery, and it could be authorized to handle this matter without any additional expense.

Mr. POU. If the gentleman will examine the resolution, I think he will see that it could not very well handle the matter.

The SPEAKER. If the House will permit, the Chair was informed this morning by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] that this resolution was submitted to the Committee on Rules, and that the Committee on Rules unanimously ordered it reported to the House. It occurred to the Chair that inasmuch as it came with a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules it would probably have the support of the House; and the Chair, therefore, recognized the gentleman from North Carolina to ask that it be taken up at this time.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand what the gentleman from North Carolina asked. I thought he was just submitting the rule for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. No; this is the resolution which the Committee on Rules reported out this morning for consideration by the House. Under the rules of the House, however, the matter would have to go over until to-morrow unless unanimous consent was granted for immediate consideration. The only question is whether the House wants to consider the resolution to-day or at some other time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if I could stop it by an objection now, I would do so; but just to put it off for a day would not avail anything. Therefore I shall not do a futile thing by objecting, as it will pass to-morrow under the special rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The report will be referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

REVISION OF THE COPYRIGHT LAW

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 229) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 229

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12094, a bill to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright and to codify and amend common-law rights of authors in their writings.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Patents, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the gentleman from Indiana just how much time he desires?

Mr. PURNELL. I would like the gentleman to yield me 30 minutes. I have no requests for time. I will try to save as much time as I can.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule from the Committee on Rules for the consideration of the copyright bill, providing for two hours' general debate.

The question of a general copyright bill has been before the Congress for many years. The last copyright bill was passed 23 years ago. The Committee on Rules felt, from the presentation made to it by the members of the Committee on Patents and Copyrights, that this was an important matter, affecting the interests of great organizations and businesses throughout the country and that it was worthy of consideration by Congress.

The Members will recall that in the last Congress we passed the so-called Vestal bill, which failed of passage in the Senate. Although I have no intimate knowledge of the details of this bill, I understand it follows somewhat generally the copyright provisions which were intended to be put into effect by the Vestal bill. The Rules Committee felt it was of sufficient importance for the House to consider it at this session.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, it is practically the same bill that was passed at the last session?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not want to say that. I understand it has the same general purpose in view.

Mr. SNELL. But not necessarily following the same language.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Some of the details are different, I imagine.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PURNELL. I have no desire to yield time at this particular time, Mr. Speaker. This is a highly technical matter, and I wish the gentleman from New York would have some Member who is more familiar with the detail of it address the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no other speakers at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12094) to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright and to codify and amend common-law rights of authors in their writings.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12094, with Mr. GAVAGAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, the subject of copyright is one of the most highly technical subjects that can come before the Congress of the United States, and in order that the membership of this House may properly understand the bill that will be presented to them, I thought I would take the privilege of giving a history of copyright legislation from its very inception up to the present time, so that each Member could intelligently understand the subject that will be discussed.

You may search through the writings of ancient and medieval times and not find a word indicative of any right possessed by the author of a book to control the multiplication of copies.

In the year of 1454 Gutenberg invented movable types of printing which made the multiplication of books exceptionally easy and brought them within the reach of all the people of Europe.

In the beginning of the sixteenth century when Henry VIII, King of England, broke with the Church of Rome, to prevent the publication of books that might be considered heretical, and to prevent dissension and discord in England, he licensed 20 printers to engage in printing, compelling them to register their works in the Stationers Co., so that he might understand, censor, and control whatever was written. Even the printer had to be apprenticed for seven years to learn his profession and be licensed by the Crown. In that way Henry controlled the printing process, as well as the printer, in the work in which he was engaged.

From 1550 to 1775 a great controversy was carried on between booksellers and lawyers as to whether authors were entitled to the exclusive right to multiply copies of their works as property or as a privilege. The courts finally declared it to be a property right. The essence of property is the unwillingness to share it, but literary property lives by communication.

About 1709 the printers of England, who enjoyed the exclusive monopoly of printing, appealed to Parliament to redress their wrongs because of the piracy of their works through Scottish printers, who were bootlegging their works by competing with English printers and underselling them in their own markets. Parliament passed a bill, the first copyright statute anywhere to be found, supposed to be drafted by that eminent writer Doctor Swift.

Queen Anne probably never realized what she was doing when she spread her angular signature on the page of a document that was handed to her as part of her royal routine. Anne was Queen Anne of England and the paper she signed was an enactment of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, forming Parliament, which became the since famous Statute of Anne, the statute that has caused more controversy since in Great Britain and the United States than any other nonpolitical act of government.

The Statute of Anne runs to many words, but its asserted purpose is set forth in the preamble and the whereas of the act, which reads:

> An act for the encouragement of learning by vesting the copies of printed books in the authors or purchasers of such copies during the times therein mentioned.

Cleared of its cumbersome phrasing, the Statute of Anne vested in the author of a book—

> The sole right and liberty of printing such book and books for the term of 1 and 20 years, to commence from the 10th day of April, 1710, and no longer—

If he already had a "copy or copies of such book or books already printed," but if his "book or books" was or were not already printed, but were still to be written, his term of copyright was to be for 14 years, with a renewal for 14 years if he was still living. The author or authors were capacitated by the common law to transfer rights to a printer or bookseller, and such persons were enabled to obtain copyright on books purchased from the author for 14 years, but by the last provision of the statute the "sole right" returned to the authors, and, inferentially, ceased to remain in the printer or bookseller.

The statute provided that "any person whatsoever" who should print or reprint or cause to be printed or reprinted or imported any such books without consent of the proprietors in writing, on discovery, of course, shall forthwith forfeit one penny for every sheet of printing, one-half of this fine to go to the Queen and the other half to the complainant. But to insure this last it was necessary for the author or proprietor by purchase to enter before publication, "the title to the copy of such book or books * * * in the register book of the company of stationers," and deposit copies of the printed works therein.

Anne started price fixing, a subject of much controversy even in these days, by decreeing in her statute that if the price of a book was too high or unreasonable, an intending purchaser could make complaint before any one of a group of officials "in that part of Great Britain called Scotland" and that any of these, "according to the best of their judgments and as to them shall seem just and reasonable, * * * and if the printer persisted in 'high or unreasonable' prices," he was fined £5 for every book so sold, or exposed for sale, by him—and the Queen got one-half of that.

Books in Greek, Latin, or foreign languages were exempted from the provisions of the statute, probably to provide source material for the "learned men." The printer was protected against unfair competition, and the public was guarded in the statute.

This Queen Anne statute directly affected the American colonies and so, directly, we may bid goodbye to Anne and the Georges, but indirectly the statutes passed by them affect our copyright laws to this day and directly affected the form, substance, and scope of copyright legislation passed by the several States of the United States before the adoption of the Constitution.

It is interesting to note the various points of view of the legislators of the States in regard to the object, subject and scope of copyright, "the sole right and liberty to copy," had now been contracted into a single word—"Copyright" in common usage, and the property element had been somewhat lost sight of, though stressed in the later English acts.

Connecticut has the honor of enacting the first copyright act; New York was the file closer. The action of the States was initiated by a resolution of the Second Continental Congress, which was the result of a report made to it by a committee, composed of Madison, Williamson, and Izard, to whom had been turned over for action certain petitions, memorials, and other papers on the subject of literary property. The resolution of Congress, dated May 2, 1783, read:

> Resolved, That it be recommended to the several States, to secure to the authors or publishers of any new books not hitherto printed, being citizens of the United States, and to their executors, administrators, and assigns, the copyright of such books for a certain time not less than 14 years from the first publication; and to secure to the said authors, if they shall survive the term first mentioned, and to their executors, administrators, and assigns, the copyright of such books for another term of time not less than 14 years, such copy or exclusive right of printing, publishing, or vending the same, to be secured to the original authors, or publishers, their executors, administrators, and assigns, by such laws and under such restrictions as the several States may deem proper.

Connecticut, in January; Massachusetts, in March; Maryland, in April, 1783, had already passed copyright acts. New Jersey led the balance of the States after the recommendation of the United States Congress on May 27; New York waited until April 29, 1786, before passing its copyright act; while Delaware seems not to have passed any copyright act. Authors seem to have taken revenge on little Delaware since by asking for few copyrights from within her borders.

The copyright laws of the several States were not successful in operation between States, and it was realized in this, as in other matters affecting the public welfare and the commerce between States, that Federal control, through Congress, was necessary. So among other rights enumerated in the Constitution and powers delegated to the United States was conveyed, in a few brief words, the authority under which Congress since has enacted all copyright legislation. The words are in Article I, section 8, paragraph 8, of the Constitution, and read:

> The Congress shall have power (par. 1) * * * To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

The first Congress—under the Constitution—in its second session, on May 31, 1790, passed the original copyright act of the United States. To all intents it was a digest of previous legislation in Great Britain and in the several States, using the "sole right and liberty" of Anne twice in reference to the first term of 14 years and the "exclusive right" of the Constitution in referring to the second term of 14 years for copyright.

This is the first time the word "copyright" was ever used.

Other sections of this copyright bill permitted the entry of foreign maps, charts, and books; allowed the American author or proprietor to sue infringers for damages; and permitted pleading of the general issue and the giving of the special matter in evidence.

It may seem curious, unless one stops to think, that maps and charts were given the place of honor in this act before books. Maps for the land and charts for the sea were far more valuable to the pioneers who were living the great adventure of building up a new country than any book or books, save a few great ones, could be. There was ample intelligence in practical things, but book "larnin" was confined to the few and those resident in the cities. That does not make the pioneers lesser men; the man who studied a map or chart could be and probably was the peer of the student of books in general intelligence.

The copyright act of 1790 lasted, unamended, until April 29, 1802, when a supplementary act was passed to extend the benefits of the original act to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints. In 1819 an act was passed extending the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, in law and equity, to original cognizance of suits, actions, controversies, and cases "arising under any law of the United States, granting or confirming to authors or inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings, inventions, and discoveries." Note here the use of "granting" and "confirming."

In 1831 an act was passed "to amend the several acts respecting copyright." Between that time and the present copyright act, 26 amendments, restrictions, or enlargements of the law on copyright were passed by Congress. Of these, the acts of 1856, 1865—extending copyright to dramatic productions and photographs—1870, 1874, 1891, 1897, and 1909 were of major importance.

Before entering on the legislation for the revision, amendment, and codification of the laws on copyright, patent, trade-mark, and design, now the active and pressing concern of the Committee on Patents, of Congress, it may be well to devote a few minutes to consideration of matters abroad affecting American authors and inventors.

The "international union" and the "convention" are often referred to in discussions on copyright. The international union is not a political movement; its full title is "The International Union for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works."

The marked increase in the diffusion of literary productions and works of art during the nineteenth century, a result, doubtless, of the general growth of education among large groups of people, brought about a distinct demand on the part of authors and artists for protection beyond the limits of their respective countries. Many countries, including the United States, in fact, denied protection to alien authors and artists and consequently encouraged piracy, which had developed to considerable proportions.

Prior to 1886 a number of European countries entered into bipartite treaties for the purpose of reciprocal protection of copyright. As early as 1839 the British Government proposed such a treaty to the United States and one was actually signed on behalf of the two countries in 1853. Opposition to it, however, developed in the Senate and consent to ratification was withheld.

In 1878 an international literary and artistic society was formed in Paris under the presidency of Victor Hugo, with the purpose in view of extending copyright protection beyond national frontiers. It held annual meetings in various European capitals.

The project of a general convention for world-wide copyright protection and the formation of an international copyright union was advanced at the meeting of 1882; the Swiss Government issued invitations to an official conference which was convened in 1884 and followed by a larger one in 1885, the latter including a consultative delegate from the United States.

This original Berne convention creating an international union for the protection of literary and artistic works was ratified and entered into force in 1887. By its terms the contracting states were "constituted into a union for the protection of the rights of authors over their literary and artistic works." Authors in one of the countries of the union were to enjoy in the others the rights which the respective national laws granted or might subsequently grant to natives; such enjoyment to be "subject to the accomplishment of the conditions and formalities prescribed by the law of the country of origin of the work." The term of enjoyment in other countries could not exceed the term granted in the country of origin.

Thus the keynote of the convention was the national treatment of literary and artistic property, provided the owner had complied with the requirements of the law of copyright in his own country or the country where he first published his copyrightable work.

The convention was applicable to all such works, which, when it came into force, had not fallen into the public domain of the country of origin. The countries parties to it were, however, left free to regulate the manner of application of this principle, each by its own domestic legislation.

The union was provided with an international office or bureau, charged with the collection and publication of useful information and preparation for subsequent conferences, contemplated in order that the convention might be periodically revised and amended.

The first such revision took place through the signature at Paris, May 4, 1896, of an additional act and declaration which undertook to clarify certain of the articles of the convention of 1886 and to increase its protective influence. An officer in the United States diplomatic service was designated to attend the conference at Paris.

A complete revision was prepared by a conference meeting at Berlin in 1908, at which an observer for the United States was present. The revised convention was signed on November 13.

The latest revision of the convention creating an international union for the protection of literary and artistic works took place at Rome in 1928. The revised instrument was signed June 2 on behalf of 33 countries. The delegates of the United States were not authorized to sign.

Compared with 1908 the developments of 1928 are few and unimportant. There are, however, three new articles and changes in half a dozen others. Protection of the author against mutilation of his work in such a way as to be prejudicial to his honor or his reputation, the term of copyright in the event of two or more collaborators, and the specified right of authors to control the use of their works in radiobroadcasting form the principal additions. The convention as revised in 1908 permitted adhering countries to substitute for any provision the corresponding provision of the original convention or the revision of 1896. As revised in 1928, such privilege was limited to certain stipulations regarding the translation of literary works.

The Rome revision entered into force August 1, 1931, among the countries which had deposited ratifications. Other countries remained members of the union by virtue of participation in an earlier form of the convention. Preparations for the next conference, to meet at Brussels in 1935, are in progress.

The International Union is now composed of 45 countries. The office of the union remains at Berne and continues to exercise much the same functions as were stipulated for it in the beginning.

Without sacrifice of any American rights, the copyright bill now before the House of Representatives enables the United States to enter the International Union for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works.

When the Committee on Patents was organized at the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, 19 members being present, it was unanimously decided to hold hearings on the subject of copyright legislation. Every industry interested in copyright was invited to be present.

This novel method was used in inaugurating and continuing the hearings of the Committee on Patents. These hearings, starting in January, 1932, were in the beginning held with no formal bill before the committee. I had extended invitations to all persons, associations, companies, concerns, and counsel interested in and affected by copyright to come before the committee and express their ideas and convictions as to what might be done to improve the copyright law of 1909 in view of the great changes brought about since then in all lines of communication, presentation, and publishing.

In doing this it was my intention to get a cross section of opinion from those most competent to give it of what should be incorporated in the proposed bill, so that all those entitled to it should have fair and equal representation and be given ample time to present their views. Authors, dramatists, composers, publishers of periodicals, magazines, books, maps, and charts; motion-picture authors, scenarists, directors, and producers; radio organizations; phonograph, music-roll, and record makers, their counsel, or organization representatives were urged to appear before the Committee on Patents and state their views. No one was denied hearing or full opportunity to present his or her views on the rights of authors and others to copyright.

After a series of hearings had been held and the statements of those present and those communicating had been considered, a bill was drawn up and introduced in the House of Representatives in order to have a definite document corrected to the moment before the committee. This and other bills were amended and introduced until the final bill, H. R. 12094, was laid before an executive meeting of the committee, favorably reported out to the House, a rule obtained, and the bill given a place on the calendar.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIROVICH. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLOOM. I am not asking the gentleman to yield, I want to enlighten him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. For the benefit of my colleague, who may differ with me, I want to assure him that in a few minutes I will allow him to ask me any question he desires, but I would like to present my story in sequence without further interruption.

This bill is now being considered by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It contains 12 fundamental principles. What are they?

First. Copyright in the author's name: Not only for the protection of the author, but in order to clarify titles for the benefit of the purchasers of author's material, it is essential that the author upon creation of his work should become entitled to copyright therein. Under the provisions of the bill the author can never lose copyright except by his own act, either by making an assignment or granting a license. It is true that if he fails to register his work his remedies against an infringer are restricted according to whether the infringement is innocent or willful. Placing the copyright in the author in the first instance further accomplishes for the United States the desired protection for its nationals abroad. The interests seem agreed that starting with the author as the copyright owner, all rights, titles, and interests derived in any part of his work will be the clearer, better protected, and more easily traced.

Second. Assignment of copyright: The author may assign his copyright. This is not a new provision of law but is continued from the present act which permits an assignment of copyright as a whole.

Third. License under copyright: The author may also license any part or interest in his work. This means that an author has complete legal right to convey any and all privileges to licensees. As an illustration of this provision, an author of a novel may legally license magazine rights to a magazine, book rights to a book publisher, theatrical rights to a manager, motion-picture rights to a producer, and radio rights to a broadcaster.

Fourth. Licensees: The bill further protects a licensee to the same extent as the present act protects a copyright proprietor. Without looking to anybody else the licensee has the absolute legal right to enforce and protect his license. This again makes for clarity of titles and clarity of title is as essential to the author as it is to the licensee.

Fifth. Remedies: The rule of damages the world over usually resolves itself into a question as to what will make the injured party whole; in other words, what will compensate him. That is the invariable rule in all ordinary cases. The new bill provides that damages where awarded may take into account this element of compensation and that the profits that may be awarded are those which may be attributed to the creation of the injured author.

Injunctions and statutory damages are retained with certain limitations.

Sixth. The innocent infringer: The present law, except in the case of certain infringements by motion-picture producers, takes no account of innocence in the matter of infringements. The new bill takes account of innocence—for instance, innocent printers who act merely to print a work, and who have no other interest in it are subject only to injunctions against future printing.

Aside from these specific instances, all innocent infringers are treated alike under the provisions of the bill and are protected by provisions which limit the amount of recovery and the character of the remedy, according to the registration or nonregistration of the work. Under the present copyright law all profits are taken from an infringer, whether innocent or otherwise. As pointed out, we believe that the success of infringement suits has been hampered by the drastic provisions of this kind in the law.

Seventh. Registration and notice: In order to obtain full remedies against an infringer, the author is required to place upon his work a copyright notice, which need not be technical, and to register his work in the copyright office at Washington. Notice and registration under the present law have always been required in the case of all published works and all works reproduced in copies for sale. Since the new bill makes the author in first instance the copyright proprietor, it is deemed a wise provision to make it very advisable for him to protect his rights by registration. Not only is this for his own benefit, but it is for the benefit of purchasers who depend upon a record title in purchasing.

Eighth. Term of copyright: In place of the awkward method of providing two terms of 28 years each, the bill substitutes one term of 56 years, which begins to run on the first publication or other public presentation of the work. The disadvantage of two terms of copyright has been that in many cases an author loses his copyright by failing to renew, and too many controversies have arisen over the rights of purchasers and the rights of authors on the expiration of the first term. The author here is given a complete term of 56 years and his copyright for that term is a property right which can be easily dealt with, and under this provision no misunderstandings can arise. On the death of the author his copyright continues in favor of his personal representatives until the end of the term, unless he has already assigned his copyright, in which case the same holds true of the copyright owner.

Ninth. Foreign market for American works: The foreign market for the works of American authors has been on the increase. American stage dramas are in great demand in the capitals of Europe, and American plays are produced each year by the dozens. American books are following the progress of American plays, and, of course, American motion pictures and music are known all over the world.

It is not unusual for a single playwright to earn many thousands of dollars in the course of a year by the performance of one of his plays in a single city on the Continent. Protection in the foreign market is becoming more and more precarious in direct proportion to the success there of the American author. Present protection of unpublished works is had by means of treaties, but it is not in all countries that these works are protected. Protection of published works is becoming more and more uncertain every day. Treaties may easily be abrogated. The sure way of protection abroad is by means of the machinery provided by the International Copyright Union, which is nothing but a treaty between 40 or 50 countries. The United States has never adhered to this union, but the provisions of the articles of the union are so clear and well defined and the protection to authors' works so secure that there is no other practicable method by which the United States can vouchsafe to her authors and their licensees this much-desired protection abroad to an equal degree. The bill is so drafted that the United States can adhere to the union.

Tenth. Radio and future rights: At the time of the passage of the 1909 act radiobroadcasting was an unknown quantity. Because of certain general provisions of that act, such as "public performance" and "mechanical reproduction," it turned out that dramatic and musical compositions were protected over the radio, but the act nowhere provided for protection over the radio in any other respect. The author of literary works is not protected under the present law. The new bill gives radiobroadcasting rights to all authors alike without discrimination and also provides that if in the future there shall be any new mediums or methods of dissemination of authors' ideas, the author shall be protected in respect of those as well.

Eleventh. Rights of the press: The bill in section 12 carefully exempts from infringement suits, performances, and so forth, neither public nor for profit, public performance of music not for profit, performance of music by charitable, religious, and other organizations, reception of radio programs and music from disks and records except where admission is charged, and the fair use of quotations from literary works. These are matters on which the House had distinctly declared itself in times past, and the committee has endeavored to meet the fixed policy of the House.

Twelfth. Construction of the bill: We claim for this bill that it is simple in its form and construction, uncomplicated by too many technicalities, and that it is a piece of legislation that can be readily read and understood by an author, publisher, producer, or other layman. It provides for all authors and all interests the rights and remedies that are now recognized in the trade between the most successful authors and the most reputable business houses. In other words, it crystallizes into law the best trade practices of the day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall be very pleased to answer any questions that any Member of the House may propound regarding the bill on copyright legislation.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I particularly want to inquire about musical compositions. As I understand it, in the past the author of a musical production sold the copyright to the printer, and we paid for the piece of music as we bought it, and the author got his money from that source. Under the bill the author receives not only money from the publishers, but I, as an innocent user of that music, may be sued by the author if I play the music, even though I pay for the copy when I buy it.

Mr. SIROVICH. That is true.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am wondering if the remedy for the innocent purchaser here is sufficient. I want to make it clear if I can, that in the past the author got his money through the publisher, but to-day I not only pay for the piece of music that I buy, but if in my hotel an orchestra should be playing that music, I am liable to pay a large sum of money to some organization to which the author seems to be forced to assign his rights.

Mr. SIROVICH. The assignment is in the old law.

Mr. GIFFORD. As I understand it the author would have to assign to one central body his privileges. The point I want to bring out is that small radio stations have to recognize this central body, and the prices for these musical compositions have recently been doubled and might be trebled, and the author himself is practically forced to assign to that central body or else he could not himself get that protection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair to the gentleman and answer his question and bring out a subject that is going to involve a great deal of controversy on this floor. We had extensive hearings from an organization called the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers. This society is an organization with a board of directors of 24 members, composed of 600 to 700 authors and composers as members and about 70 to 90 publishers. When it was originally formed it had 12 publishers on the board of directors representing the publishers and 12 authors and composers representing the authors and composers. This board of directors is self-anointed, self-appointed, and self-perpetuating. Its object is to do one thing, and that is to protect the publishers and to protect the authors and composers. In order to join the organization, as I understand it, every author and composer has to assign his right to this society, and when Sigmund Romberg, one of the greatest American composers, came before our committee, the man who wrote plays like Maytime, Blossom Time, the Student Prince, the Desert Song, Rio Rita, and other productions, he said that he received the highest award, with John Philip Sousa, as royalties every year, which amounted to about $5,000, but that if he had to go out and collect these royalties himself all over the United States and find out where some one was playing his music, it would have cost him $25,000 to $30,000 to collect the $5,000 that belonged to him. So it stands to reason that it is necessary to have an organization that will collect the royalties of these authors. Because of protests of many Members of Congress along the line the gentleman has indicated, I endeavored to find out something about the organization and found that it collects about $800,000 to $900,000 a year from the motion-picture industry—I mean by that the picture exhibitors, who have between 15,000 to 20,000 motion-picture houses in the country—and it gets about $1,000,000 a year from radiobroadcasting and about $200,000 a year from hotels and other collateral interests.

This money is divided by the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers into two parts. Half goes to the publishers and the other half to the authors and composers, who are divided into classes, depending upon how their music sells. The complaint that came in is the fact that the organization is charging more than it should charge.

I admit that in the hearings conducted before our committee there are some parts where they are charged too little, and some parts where they charged too much. For example, if you have a small motion-picture house in a city in Texas or Oklahoma that may play three or four times a week, perhaps an hour or two at night, they charge 10 cents royalty per year per seat. If, on the other hand, you go to New York City to the great Capitol or Roxy Theater, which play from 11 in the morning until 1 o'clock at night, using 2,000,000 pieces all the year round, they charge the same identical sum. Now, it stands to reason that income taxes are not paid on that basis in this country. A man who is paid little should not be compelled to pay the same as the man who has earned a million. So, when that organization was before our committee they conceded that and stated they would try to change it later on.

There are broadcasting stations which complain that this society has just brought to them a statement in which they want more money. They want 5 per cent of the gross income, in addition to the license fee that is being charged; but when the representatives were before the committe, they stated distinctly that the big broadcasting stations are taking in millions and millions, and use 95 per cent of the music of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, and pay them less than 1 per cent of the total amount of money that may be brought in. They feel that the radio has destroyed the sheet-music-publishing industry, because where an author or composer made money in the past through the sale of millions of copies of music which went all over the United States, to-day the radio, by playing this music one month, destroys the music and there is no income.

With reference to manufacturers of records, like the Victor, the Columbia, and the Brunswick, where millions of dollars were made in the past, this organization has been ruined through the medium of the radio, because nobody is buying records. So the author and composer comes along and says, "Since the radio has destroyed my income, and since through the perfection of mechanical devices and records my source of revenue is destroyed, it must come from the substitute, which is the broadcasting station." The only bone of contention, however, is that many of these small broadcasting stations are in the red. They are not making any money, and if they are compelled to pay this additional fee, according to the statements made before the committee, the small broadcasting stations will be ruined and bankrupted.

Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. GIFFORD. It answers the question, and it brings forward the other question: Is there to be no limitation of this self-appointed organization as to what they may charge? And the other point that I want to continually bring out is the fact that after we buy and pay for our sheet of music are we forever to be subject to a possible law suit on account of using the music that we buy and pay for? I would like to vote for this bill, but I also fear what the future may bring forth in these changes which are being made.

Mr. SIROVICH. In relation to the last question, I wish to state that in a decision handed down by Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the case of American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers against Shanley, in a decision written by Mr. Justice Holmes he contended that this society has the right to collect royalty on a public performance for profit of music and finds in this decision that the author and composer is being protected, that where a public performance for profit is taking place, where music is being played and admission and cover charges and other charges are being paid, the author and composer has the right to collect his royalty. So for the benefit of many Members of Congress who came before this committee and said to the committee that there were charitable institutions, religious institutions, agricultural institutions, and fraternal institutions which used music whose proceeds are applied for the development of that organization, this committee placed an exemption clause in the bill that no royalty shall be collected from them where that money goes for religious, charitable, and agricultural and fraternal purposes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. As I understand, the original bill in section 35 provided that one copy of any work printed in a foreign country could be brought into this country free for any public library or branch thereof, and so forth; and I find there is now eliminated from this bill the privilege of an American scholar bringing in one copy. I have a letter dated April 18, 1932, from the gentleman, stating that he was in favor of that principle. Do I now understand that such an amendment will be acceptable to the gentleman?

Mr. SIROVICH. For the benefit of my friend, the gentleman from New York, I would like to explain the following facts appertaining to what the gentleman has just read. When our committee heard representatives of the American Federation of Labor and other interests, like the publishers of books and some of the representatives of the learned societies, this point was brought out: That where an English author secures a copyright in England and the book is printed in England—mark you, this is very important—where a book is copyrighted in England and where it is published in England but it is not published in America, then every learned society, every library, or organization that promotes education has the right to send to England and import that book; but where an English author has a copyright in England and the book is printed in England, and an American publisher is licensed to print this same book in America, and it is printed in America, it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Patents and Copyrights that the American learned societies and scholars should buy the book in America from American publishers. It helps to keep the American printers at work. That is all.

Mr. ERK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. ERK. I am in accord with certain provisions of the bill, but I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When the gentleman says "printed or published" he means also circulated, does he not?

Mr. SIROVICH. Exactly. That is the purpose of printing and publishing.

Mr. ERK. The bill does not state "circulate." You may print or publish, but not circulate. Another thing, no song or piece of music is original. Every piece of music or song is a rhythm of some other song or music. Who will determine whether or not a person is infringing another author's song? Strictly speaking, there is nothing new or original.

Mr. SIROVICH. When we had the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers before us some of the great composers felt that where four bars of music were used that constituted plagiarism.

So far as the gentleman's thought is concerned that no music is original, for that matter we can say nothing is original. What is the difference between a patent and a copyright? In a patent an individual is given an exclusive monopoly for 17 years over the invention he has perfected, and nobody else is permitted to make it. Now, let us take a copyright. If I write a history of the World War and secure a copyright for 56 years, and secure control over that book on the history of the World War, every Member of Congress could write a history of the World War, but he must put it in his own thought. The circulation is limited because different people want to read different versions of the history of the World War. When invention comes in there is an exclusive monopoly. In a copyright we have the intellectual thoughts of a man without invention, it is creation.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I live in a section of the country where we have a very large number of hotels. Other Congressmen represent places where they have a very large number of hotels, and every Congressman has perhaps one. Is there to be no limit upon the charges this organization can make against a hotel? My experience has been that arbitrarily they send in a bill for so much money and threaten trouble. Is there no way in which the bill can be amended to provide some limitation upon the charges that can be made so that a man would know there would be reasonableness to the charge?

Mr. SIROVICH. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], the decision of Mr. Justice Holmes where the three p's come in—public performance for profit—makes it absolutely mandatory for hotels or other institutions that use music for the purposes of getting a clientele to pay. Of course, where the question of reasonableness enters in, the courts can not determine what the price shall be. We can not go into price fixing.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. Under section 9 of the bill, where an innocent party infringes a copyright, I notice it is provided that nothing but an injunction shall apply against the future use of the copyrighted work, except that where such infringer has incurred a substantial expenditure of liability in connection with the exploitation, production, or performance of any such copyrighted work, such infringer shall be liable only for a reasonable license fee not in excess of $2,500 nor less than $25.

Who fixes that license fee?

Mr. SIROVICH. I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi this section pertains to infringement before registration or recordation.

Mr. BUSBY. No; that is section 8. I am reading section 9, where a party innocently infringes without public use, without knowledge of the copyright. Who fixes the fee that is to be charged?

Mr. SIROVICH. The court.

Mr. BUSBY. No; the bill does not so provide.

Mr. SIROVICH. That is what the bill states, if the gentleman will read it further. If that provision is not in the bill, the gentleman can amend it. The court fixes the fee. If Mr. Ziegfeld innocently took a play that did not belong to him, or purchased it from some one where he had no idea it had been copyrighted, and if he had been put to expense he would be required to pay a reasonable license fee.

Mr. BUSBY. What I have in mind is that heretofore the composers, authors, and publishers' organization has set up what they called fees, fixed by themselves on certain copyrighted material. I take it they would be the ones to fix the charge against the infringer in those circumstances if the copyright were in their hands.

Mr. SIROVICH. No; that does not pertain to them, it pertains to any innocent infringer.

Mr. BUSBY. Anybody?

Mr. SIROVICH. Anybody. The newspaper people came before our committee and complained that there are rackets in the newspaper game. Photographs are sent in and the newspapers held up for all kinds of infringement because of some little contention, and where it is an innocent infringement, and where the whole publication of a newspaper, magazine, or periodical might be prevented from being published by injunction, it was thought best where an innocent infringement takes place to have the court decide what the fee should be.

Mr. BUSBY. What provision gives the court authority to decide what the reasonable license shall be that is to be charged under section 9 of the bill?

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman will find it if he will read the bill further.

Mr. BUSBY. I am just asking the gentleman from New York, thinking he understood it.

Mr. SIROVICH. There is a section of the bill that absolutely gives protection to every innocent infringer and provides that the court shall decide what ought to be paid after the thing is done.

Mr. BUSBY. That is all well enough, but the court does not come in voluntarily and decide that a charge is unreasonable.

Mr. SIROVICH. My dear sir, if you infringe innocently upon some one else and you are notified through an attorney, and then if you are willing to make an amicable settlement, why should the court intervene?

Mr. BUSBY. I will discuss that in my own time.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Under section 12, subsection (d), I think you are going to create the greatest racket we have ever seen in this country. Under subsection (d), if there is a radio set in a hotel room, it provides for the overhead charges. Of course, a hotel is not going to have a radio set in a room unless it is included in the overhead charge. Under this provision an association can step in and demand a royalty.

Mr. SIROVICH. That again comes in under the consideration of a public performance for profit, for the simple reason that if you have a hotel on one side of the street with no radio in it and I put up a brand-new hotel with radio sets in it and charge the same price for a room you charge, with the additional advantage of a radio set in a room, that is going to promote the business of the hotel that has radio in it to the disadvantage of the other hotel.

Mr. ARENTZ. In my opinion you are doing just the thing we are trying to prevent in this country; that is, to stop harassing individuals. All through the United States we are doing it in the laws we are continually passing here. It is ridiculous and absurd, in my opinion.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill is founded on the theory of monopoly for the authors and let the public pay the freight.

Mr. SIROVICH. Copyright laws and patent laws absolutely grant a monopoly. That is what Article I, section 8, paragraph 8, of the Constitution of the United States provides.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Constitution says for a limited term. You are granting an absolute monopoly to the authors and giving no consideration to the public. I say, the public first and then the authors.

Mr. SIROVICH. This bill provides just what the Constitution of the United States grants. When the gentleman comes to any provision in the bill which he feels is not right, I suggest that he offer any amendment that the House will support.

Mr. STAFFORD. The whole bill is written on the idea of granting an absolute monopoly to the author and not giving any consideration to the public.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is not an author entitled to a monopoly? Does not the Constitution of the United States say?—

> Congress shall have the power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Is not that a monopoly?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not for 56 years; absolutely not.

Mr. SIROVICH. The copyright bill now in existence, written in 1909, gives an author 56 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. It should not be 56 years.

Mr. SIROVICH. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that almost 40 years ago Congress passed a law giving every author a copyright for 28 years, with the right of renewal for 28 years more, which makes 56 years. So Congress gave it to them.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, with almost 30 different interests involved in this copyright bill, pretty nearly every industry—authors, composers, publishers, motion-picture exhibitors, newspapers, magazines, periodicals, theatrical and dramatic interests, mechanical device people, record companies, and so forth—all with the single exception of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers have indorsed this bill. Such great writers as Will Irwin, George Creel, Rupert Hughes, Owen Wister, John Erskine, Struthers Burt, Robert Chambers, Juliet Wilbor Tompkins, Irvin S. Cobb, and innumerable others have written Members of Congress appealing to them to emancipate them by giving them copyright in their own name. I appeal to the justice and consideration of the membership of this House to answer their cry for copyright protection. Will you heed their request? [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, most of the Members of the House are familiar with the fact that for many years I have been very much interested in copyright legislation, and working in an effort to get upon our statute books some proper provisions to supersede the very archaic and obsolete law of 1909, under which we are now operating.

To-day, with this copyright measure pending, many pleasant memories of this service come to me, but they are tinged also with sadness. In my judgment, no man in this country has done or will do as much to make desirable copyright legislation possible as our late and lamented friend, Albert H. Vestal, of Indiana. [Applause.] For eight years he labored faithfully, diligently, and efficiently in an effort to reconcile and harmonize the divergent interests affected by copyright legislation. At first these various interests were at one another's throats, but through the patience and persistence of our former colleague he so oiled the troubled waters that in the last session of Congress he was able to bring before this body and to pass a copyright bill. It passed the House of Representatives with only one amendment, and that is a tribute to his skill and to his industry and to his intelligence.

Through those years it was my pleasure in a very modest way to cooperate with Mr. Vestal, and I value that association with him. It is out of the depth of that experience that I am enabled to make this statement and pay this tribute.

As is generally known, last year the Vestal bill failed of passage in another body largely by reason of certain filibustering tactics, which prevented many measures from being considered. When we came back for this session, Mr. Vestal, who had labored so long and so faithfully with the committee in the forming of his bill and in preparing the way to make a consideration of copyright matters feasible, introduced on the 8th day of last December H. R. 139. That bill, in the main, is the bill which the House passed last year. That bill, introduced by this man who had given so many years of study to the measure and who had made it possible to consider copyright legislation in this body, was never considered for one minute by the Committee on Patents.

Now, what is the situation this year? I am familiar with the terms of the Vestal bill. I worked on it for eight years. In collaboration with Mr. Vestal during the last session, I explained its various provisions when it was before the House. I know something about it. Casting aside this bill that was the result of these years of labor and study, we have had introduced this year several copyright bills.

I wish to be entirely fair to the chairman of the committee; and if I make any statement which is inaccurate, I should like to be corrected. Three copyright bills were introduced by the chairman of the committee. One was introduced on the 10th of March, one on the 22d of March, and one on the 30th of March, 1932. He has introduced two or three bills since then, but they have been more or less modifications or amendments of the three bills cited.

What about the hearings on this measure? Hearings began early in February, but they were quite general in their nature. The chairman had an idea, very much the English idea, and perhaps it is a good one, of conducting a school for the benefit of the committee and having men interested in various features of copyright legislation appear and give their views without reference to any particular bill, for no bill had then been introduced except the Vestal bill, and it was not considered or made the basis of hearings.

After the bill of March 30 was introduced—and it was upon this bill that a rule was originally asked—we had, I think, two days of hearings. I attended them. I did not attend the school during February, because I had had eight years of study on this subject, was very busy with many official matters, and wanted to reserve my strength for the time when we should actually have a bill before us. All the hearings, which were held prior to the application for a rule, were held prior to the introduction of the bill on which the rule was asked. The Committee on Rules suggested that the Committee on Patents should hold further hearings and give those who desired an opportunity to be heard, and such a hearing was held on May 12.

The bill this year is different in many particulars from the one we had before us last year. This bill was not drawn by the Committee on Patents, and I think I may say, and I hope members of the committee will correct me if I am wrong, that the committee did not share in drafting the provisions of this bill. I had heard the rumor that the bill had been drawn by a young lawyer in New York in the office of some attorneys who are of counsel for certain concerns which would be affected by copyright legislation. If it is a good bill, I take no exception to that, if, indeed, that be true. It happened that on May 12, the last day on which hearings were held, this young gentleman was present and rose to interpolate some statement in the testimony of a witness before the committee. That was a rainy day, the House was not in session, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. GOODWIN], and I were the only committee members present. We devoted the entire day to the hearing. I incorporate an extract from this hearing of May 12, pages 115 and 116:

The CHAIRMAN. Read the bill. The sky is the limit. Mr. Jaffe, where willful infringement takes place after registration, the sky is the limit?

Mr. JAFFE. After registration.

Mr. LANHAM. What interest do you represent, Mr. Jaffe?

Mr. JAFFE. I am associated with the counsel for the National Publishers' Association.

Mr. LANHAM. May I ask him this question?

The CHAIRMAN. Any question you want.

Mr. LANHAM. I have understood that this bill, not those features we are discussing, was drawn by you. Is that correct?

Mr. JAFFE. No. I sat in with a number of other people with various interests, with a number of other attorneys who took part in drafting the provisions.

Mr. LANHAM. Was it drawn by attorneys in New York?

Mr. JAFFE. No.

Mr. LANHAM. Who did draw this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. I drew the bill. I took the bill that was given to me by Mr. DILL, redrafted his bill, took his bill, and I did not like every word of it, and I rewrote it and redrafted it and called in various representatives of different organizations that were responsible to help along with the particular interest that they represented.

It seems clear from this excerpt that the Committee on Patents has had little or nothing to do with the preparation of this measure.

Now, gentlemen, reflect upon the situation. After the committee had worked for eight years in drafting a bill which the committee understood, this year we have had three different bills introduced in rapid succession, prior to the subsequent ones which have been amendatory of certain provisions, and these bills have had the careful consideration, it seems, of various persons but not of your Committee on Patents.

I want a copyright measure that will protect everybody that is entitled to protection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, for a brief one.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas five additional minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is the Vestal bill that we passed in this House much of an improvement upon the bill that is now being considered in the committee to-day?

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman that I wish I could tell him. These bills have been introduced in such rapid succession and we have been so busy with so many matters here, and the bill upon which the rule was asked was introduced on the 30th of March, with other amendatory bills introduced subsequent to that date, I do not know just exactly what the present bill does.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does not the gentleman know something about the Vestal bill?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; I do know something about the Vestal bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And whether the Vestal bill would discriminate or would give equal protection to everybody?

Mr. LANHAM. The Vestal bill is not before us. If the Vestal bill were before us, I could discuss it with the gentleman; but I have not had sufficient opportunity to study the provisions of this bill. That is the very point I am trying to make.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Why did the gentleman say before the Rules Committee and say on the floor now that the bill was drawn by some lawyer? Does the gentleman wish to imply that there was anything ulterior?

Mr. LANHAM. Nothing whatever.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am afraid the Members will so take it.

Mr. LANHAM. I trust not, for no offense is intended. I am simply trying to convey the impression, which is an accurate one, that the committee did not draw this bill. If it had been drawn by the committee, I should understand it better.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Would the gentleman, knowing as much as he does about copyright legislation, be willing to accept the Vestal bill passed by Congress last year?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; but I think there are a few amendments which should be made to that bill. We now have the benefit of the Senate hearings on that measure as well as those of the House.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman is for the Vestal bill rather than this bill?

Mr. LANHAM. Well, I understand the Vestal bill, and I know very little about this bill.

Now I should like to call attention to one or two more things. In the first place, the constitutional provision which forms the basis for copyright legislation has to do with the protection of authors and inventors. It appears from this bill that the prime consideration all the way through is to give protection to the users of their material.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman refer to the publishers, the middlemen, or the consumers?

Mr. LANHAM. I am referring to the various interests that use the material in trade.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman does not mean the general public?

Mr. LANHAM. No; I do not.

Mr. SIROVICH. What does the gentleman say about the author, so far as this bill is concerned?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman state what he said about the authors?

Mr. LANHAM. I say that authors of all classes are better protected by the Vestal bill than they are by this bill. I say that this bill is drawn primarily for the benefit of the users.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman does not mean the public.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not mean the public. In the last session of Congress it was brought to our attention that there was then great urgency for copyright legislation because it was contended, whether correctly or not I hardly know, that if we could pass a copyright law prior to August 1, 1931, we could enter the Berne convention under the terms of the Berlin convention of 1908, which would be more favorable for American authors than the terms of the Rome convention of 1928. However, inasmuch as August 31, 1931, has come and gone, that urgency has passed.

There are many things about this bill that are confusing. One worthy of consideration is that this measure deprives authors of their common-law rights. The constitutionality of this bill is attacked by some on that ground, whether wisely or not I do not know, for I have not had the time to investigate the question as I should like. In the light of various judicial decisions, it is clearly a matter worthy of serious study.

I hold no brief for any interest that has appeared before this committee during the last 10 years, but have been and am seeking in fairness to get justice and proper protection for them all. Very much attention has been centered on the American Society of Authors, Composers, and Publishers. They have even been referred to as racketeers and much has been said about their receipts for the use of copyrighted music. It seems to be generally conceded that some such organization is necessary inasmuch as the users of music would otherwise have to deal with each individual copyright owner and this would lead to a chaotic condition for all who have need of these works. But great stress has been laid on their receipts. I take no exception whatever to such investigation of the income but, if we are to act intelligently in settling these puzzling problems, it seems that similar information should be available with reference to other interests affected by copyright. The recent hearings give such information with reference to some of the organizations. One of these is known as Erpi, a word made up of the initials of the name of the corporation, Electrical Research Products (Inc.). We are advised that this organization owns and controls the patent rights for reproducing sound from films.

It was testified before the committee that Erpi charges the producer of motion pictures $500 per reel—not per picture—for the use of these rights. In other words, if a picture has six reels, the charge made of the producer by Erpi would be $3,000. We were told, too, that the producers and distributors of motion pictures were for all practical purposes the same organizations. Of course, this charge made by Erpi is passed on to the exhibitors of motion pictures and they have to pay it in what is known as a score charge. To explain, when an exhibitor wishes to present a motion picture he has to pay for the picture itself and then an additional sum for the score charge based on these patent rights.

The testimony shows that up to date the Erpi organization has made from this score charge $128,000,000 and that the people who furnished the music for the films were paid $2,000,000. However, this music was not furnished by the American Society of Authors, Composers, and Publishers, and we were told that not one cent of this money went to this society.

I am not now discussing whether this charge made by Erpi on these patent rights and passed on to the exhibitor is just or not. It may be. Without further investigation, I should not undertake to say, but I mention this in order to bring to your attention that in the matter of financial receipts there are many things to be considered in addition to the 10 cents per seat per year which the American Society has charged for the use of music. When we go into the matter of commercial returns, a spirit of fairness would certainly impel us to know what we could about all phases of the question in the many fields affected by copyright.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. LANHAM. Give me one minute more.

Mr. PERKINS. No; I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. In speaking of Erpi, that made in the first two years or put in reserve $128,000,000 in profits by the reproduction of these sound waves, is it not a fact that this bill now intends to give to Erpi or these different companies the right to charge whatever they want under the licensing of music instead of charging 10 cents per seat per year?

Mr. LANHAM. I think there is no limitation in the bill as to what they may charge, but I am not now discussing that phase of the matter.

Mr. BLOOM. And if this bill should prevail, then the companies who license the moving pictures, such as Erpi and others, would have the right to charge anything they want to the moving-picture theaters throughout the country, whether 10 cents a seat or $1 a seat.

Mr. LANHAM. That is my understanding; but let me say that I am not now arguing the question as to whether or not Erpi is entitled to make such charge—it may be, I do not know—but I am undertaking to show that when we begin to talk money matters, it is hardly fair to consider only the receipts of the men who make the whole industry possible and overlook the many millions that these various concerns, through modern invention, are making out of the products that are furnished them.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is the gentleman opposing this bill, and if so, is he proposing anything as a substitute for it?

Mr. LANHAM. In copyright matters I think the most careful committee consideration of a bill is absolutely necessary. I contend that the provisions of this measure have not had that consideration. Consequently, if I now had to make a choice, I should prefer the Vestal bill as a substitute, because I do know something about that bill. I think it needs some amendments, but it was passed in the House last year substantially as it is and then was made the basis of hearings before the Senate committee. Those hearings disclosed some modifications that might well be made.

This is my attitude: I do not want to stand in the way of proper copyright legislation. I have been working for it for years, but I must say in all candor that I do not know just what this bill does. We have had copyright bills hurled at us with such rapidity and frequency during this session that I am necessarily entirely too confused about them to know what to recommend.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. TABER. If the committee itself does not understand the bill thoroughly and is not prepared to tell the House what we should do with reference to the details of it, would not the proper procedure be to let the committee try again?

Mr. LANHAM. That is a matter for the Committee of the Whole House and the House to determine. For my part, I am willing to sit there and hold hearings day in and day out, month in and month out, to try to get a bill that will really be a proper one to place upon our statute books and deal fairly with all concerned, one that will have due regard to the interests of the public, the authors, and those who in business use the author's material.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman has made a statement about Erpi and a great imposition put upon the theaters.

Mr. LANHAM. Just a moment. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I made the statement that Erpi might be justified in charging that amount, that I did not know. I was simply calling attention to some of the large sums that go to others than the authors.

Mr. SIROVICH. I just wanted to say to the gentleman that I just received a letter from the motion-picture exhibitors which says:

> The Committee on Patents has reported, and the Committee on Rules has given a special rule for the consideration of the above-mentioned bill. We are glad to say that in its present form the bill is entirely satisfactory to the independent motion-picture theater owners represented by this association.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman will please not take up all my time, because the gentleman knows as well as I do that he is referring to something very different from what I have alluded to.

Mr. SIROVICH. Was that not taken up with the motion-picture-theater exhibitors and the American Society when we had hearings?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further. I simply make this statement, that the question to which the gentleman from New York refers is as to whether the exhibitors shall pay for all these charges in one fee or whether they shall pay one fee for the picture, another for the score charge, and another for the right to use the music.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield the gentleman from Texas one additional minute.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, copyright is a technical and troublesome and controversial matter. It is a difficult thing to understand in all its ramifications even after years of study have been devoted to it. The phraseology of our copyright law has been so often construed by the courts that various words have come to have fixed and definite meanings. Now, when we undertake to supplant a bill which has been the subject of 8 years of study with one that has capped the climax of 3 or 4 or 5 introduced recently and in rapid succession, a bill which the committee has not had ample opportunity to consider, and in the drawing of which it had little or no part, it seems to me we ought to pause and reflect before we take hasty action, because when we do get a copyright law on the statute books, we should put one there that we feel and believe deals fairly with all interests and the public as well. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, my position in opposition to hasty and ill-considered copyright legislation was rather strengthened by an opinion delivered by the Supreme Court which I read during last summer's vacation, Buck versus Jewell-LaSalle Realty Co., Two hundred and eighty-third United States Supreme Court Reports, where a hotel proprietor, having receiving sets in the various rooms of his hotel, was, without knowledge of infringement, held liable as broadcasting the music that came in over the air; he was held liable as an infringer by the owner of the original copyright.

I said in colloquial discussion with the gentleman from New York that this bill is spread with monopoly from beginning to end. It only considers the author and composer and their assignees. It does not give consideration to the public. I am standing here, as I did a year ago, trying to take the viewpoint of the public, and I know from my service in this House and from my observation afield that the patent laws are breeders of monopoly, breeders of trusts, and here we are extending a right which, under the provision of the Constitution, says the right shall be for a limited term. We are not only extending the right to the author but to those who control the author's rights, namely, the radiobroadcaster, this group of composers, authors, and publishers, who have racketeering attorneys out in my district trying to mulct from a little hotel or a little restaurant a penalty for happening inadvertently to play on a phonograph a piece that happens to be copyrighted.

I differ from the previous speaker. My service here causes me to look with suspicion upon an attorney for a special interest who prepares a bill. A year ago I had some litigation with a prominent patent attorney in New York. He beseeched me to favor some patent legislation. Of course, he views it from the angle of his clients. So this attorney who has prepared this bill views it from his viewpoint.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. In a moment. I say that this bill has not been given the consideration which bills are generally given—it is not in accord with established practice to accept the viewpoint of the special interest, but they should be analyzed by the committee and gone over disinterestedly from the public standpoint, which has not been done in this instance.

The gentleman from New York made a wonderfully historical discourse about copyright legislation, dating back to the time of Queen Bess or Queen Anne. That was all very nice, but the gentleman never got down to the real fact before the House, and that is this bill. The gentleman did not say anything about it, except to say we are throwing a protecting arm over the author, the author's assignee, in every possible way. But who pays the freight, as the gentleman from Texas said? The public. Who is being mulcted to-day by this Erpi? The public. Who is going to be mulcted more by Erpi? The public. Does the gentleman intend to recognize in these times of depression exacting further tribute from the public who patronizes the popular motion-picture house?

Mr. SIROVICH. For the sake of the gentleman from Wisconsin I want to say that the statement that that man prepared this bill is absolutely and unqualifiedly wrong.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whose bill is it?

Mr. SIROVICH. It is the bill of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] denies that it is the bill of the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I served for a time on the Committee on Patents, which handles copyright legislation. I took a great deal of interest in the subject some two or three years ago, when Mr. Vestal worked so hard and so continuously to bring out his bill and secure its enactment into law. He is to be commended for the zeal he put into that effort. He was assisted ably by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. Unfortunately I could not see the merit in that bill.

The present bill is very similar in many respects to the Vestal bill, and I will point out in a few words wherein I think it is undesirable.

In the first place, a copyright is a monopoly. Under the law the individuals holding this monopoly are permitted to join in a supermonopoly by combining. The Sherman antitrust law does not touch them, because a copyright is an intangible thing and is not dealt with by the Sherman Antitrust Act. So this supermonopoly makes such arrangements as it believes the trade will be able to bear. This supermonopoly was defended by the gentleman from Texas, but he did not mention the real heads—Mr. Buck, Mr. Burkhan, and others—who are in the business solely for what they can get out of the people through the "squeeze" methods they have inaugurated. I will also mention the Erpi interests. I think this is another organization that is working the public all it possibly can.

The trouble with the bill is there is no restraint of any kind put upon these organizations in their treatment of the public. There is no licensing arrangement whereby they can be restrained from doing the most outrageous things if the public can be made to stand for them. Why, the Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers could absolutely—and I invite the criticism of any gentleman if this statement is not right—put all of the radio stations in this country out of business in 30 days if they raised the license fees too high, because they are the sole judges as to what they will charge the public through the broadcasting organizations. They have been getting about $1,000,000 a year from this source. Under their present purpose as announced by them I am reliably informed they will get three and one-half millions of dollars from the public through the radio-broadcasting stations of the country during the coming year.

Any bill that does not provide for a restraint on the Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers and other like organizations, and provide for a determination of what is reasonably independent of any of these high-handed organizations is not a proper bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I have but five minutes. The gentleman from New York used over an hour.

Now, the gentleman from New York says the provisions of the bill take care of that. What are the provisions that take care of that? Section 24 provides:

> The Supreme Court of the United States shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for practice and procedure in any action or other proceeding under this act.

That is not very specific. The fact is these organizations are thoroughly organized throughout the country, and have snoopers going about from hotels to barber shops and drug stores and all these little places using graphophone records and other means of recording and making them pay enormous amounts by threatening them with law suits. This bill is no better in that respect than the Vestal bill for the simple reason you will find in sections 8 and 9 that even if an individual infringes innocently, he shall be charged not more than $2,500 by this individual owner, or this society, or by Erpi, or whoever owns the copyright, and not less than $25.

I am against any bill having that kind of a provision, and where the public is unprotected. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, obviously I am not in a position to know much about the details of this copyright bill which is before us to-day, but over the last five years I have seen enough of abuse of the present copyright law to cause me not to be particularly enthusiastic in supporting any kind of legislation which extends one iota more privilege to any piece of copyrighted music. As a matter of fact, I should be ready and willing to-day to vote that music is not subject to copyright, on the theory that those who have enjoyed the blessings and privileges of copyright music have abused and sinned away their rights, call it racketeering or call it what you please.

A little country drug store or restaurant buys a phonograph; then buys a phonograph record, the recording company having paid for the privilege of making that record; then that little drug store or restaurant plays that phonograph in that restaurant or drug store, and then some snooper comes in and has that man haled into the United States district court and compels him to pay $50 or $100 or more in the form of fees. When that is done I claim it is racketeering, and I do not care whether it is Capone who practices that kind of business or whether it is the most sanctimonious author of music who has ever lived. [Applause.]

It is done in the name of the United States because it is abusing the rights of the copyright law. I believe in the right of patents and I believe in the right of copyright. When a man has copyrighted something he should profit to some extent, but he should have no right to take advantage of the right which has been granted to him and use it as a means of robbing the public.

The patent law has been used in that way more than once. We go ahead and enact antimonopoly laws in this country. Then some poor fellow patents something. He never gets much out of it. Some company picks it up and uses it as a stranglehold on the public.

The invention of the talking picture was a fine thing, but it was not right to use it as a means of monopolizing the picture-show business of this country; but they did that. In the early days of the talking picture an individual in a town operating a picture show could not get the talking equipment. If he did get it, he was obliged to pay $10,000 or $15,000 for it, and then he did not own it. He was only renting it. Not only did they keep him from getting the machine but they waited until some chain picture house was able to come down and freeze him out and buy his property for little or nothing. They use the patent laws to-day in that way, and the copyright laws are likewise being used.

An individual could buy a radio and set it up. He would hold a country dance, and along would come one of these snoopers for the Society of Authors and Composers, not particularly interested in the $5 or $10 license that might be collected from that man but interested in the fees and penalties that can be collected from him. It is a hijacking game the way it is practiced, and nothing less.

When I come here to vote for a copyright law I believe I should prefer to vote for one that will take away the right to copyright music. However, instead of now changing the copyright law for the benefit of copyright holders, I prefer to let it go the way it is until the people get sick and tired of it and rebel against it, or until the composers do the right thing. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I realize that I may not be competent to discuss many features of this bill, but as I have heard members of the committee say that they, themselves, do not fully understand it I feel that I need make no further excuse. However, I do feel qualified to ask about the measure and to criticize it. Since many proprietors of small hotels have told me that they have been called upon to pay large sums, or make settlement for having used some musical compositions for which they had bought and paid, or because they had been using records on a talking machine with no knowledge that the authors of the compositions had not already been fully settled with by the publishers, I make this protest.

I have asked the question whether or not an innocent infringer of a copyright is to be properly taken care of under this bill, and the only answer which I have received so far is that the author of a musical composition must necessarily assign it to some central body, which can afford to see to it that the composer's rights are protected, and that in doing this the central body becomes a manipulator for the composer in his name. It would seem that there is going to be no limit to what this central organization can demand from a proprietor of a small hotel or the owner of a small radio-broadcasting company. They swoop down upon them and say, "You are running that at a profit." Of course, a hotel, for example, is supposed to make a profit, but in heaven's name is every little thing which is added to make it more attractive to its guests, but which may not bring any profit by, or of, itself to be made to pay a duty?

Many moderate-sized hotels can not afford to hire an orchestra, but do so simply for the benefit of their guests. Of course, it might not be possible to prove that the orchestra did not add anything to its profits, but it would be equally difficult to show that it did. I therefore say that at present this demand for payment to copyright holders in such cases is an abuse of power which should not be permitted. There ought to be some definite limitation in the matter, or some impartial body should be created to determine the fair and proper sum to be assessed.

I fear that this organization which represents the composer may be not purely protective but a manipulating body. It may be extremely harmful, not to say offensive, and I ask the Members who, like myself, may have had small broadcasting radio stations and hotels within their own localities imposed upon, if it is not a good time to inquire into this matter during the consideration of this bill? This is my reason for speaking at this particular time. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, personally, in the present condition of affairs in this country, I do not believe this is an opportune time to pass such a drastic copyright law. I am going to try to answer, if I may, some of the questions that have been brought up this afternoon; and if any of the Members want to ask me any question, do not hesitate about interrupting me. I shall be pleased to yield at any time.

With reference to copyright, it has been stated that the copyright should be in the name of the author. The copyright to-day can be in the name of the author. It can be in the name of anyone who wants the copyright. If you write something and want the copyright in your name or in your wife's name or under any other name, you can have it, and the protection you get under such a copyright to-day is just the same as the protection provided in the bill.

Last year, when we had up the Vestal bill and we fought for a divisible copyright, for which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] is claiming so much to-day, the gentleman himself was the only man on the committee who opposed that very important provision.

Furthermore, with respect to the Berne convention, I was appointed a delegate to the convention by President Coolidge and was sent to Rome and stayed there nearly two months in consultation with delegates from the different countries, and it was because we asked, through our ambassador at Rome, for a special concession that we were so anxious to go into the Berne convention last year, as provided for in the Vestal bill. However, under present conditions, to-day is not the proper time to consider going into the Berne convention. I have been studying the Berne convention for 25 years and this is not a new idea with me. I know practically all about the Berne convention, and, in my opinion, we would be making a mistake to go into the Berne convention at this time, under the Rome convention of 1928, when we know nothing at all about it.

Under the provisions of this bill one of the greatest, and perhaps the only, right that the author now has, which is his common-law right, is taken away from him. There would be no more secrecy in letter writing, and you would have no protection for the treasures of your dear ones. If you have any letters of a great-grandmother or a great-grandfather or of your mother or father, under the provisions of this bill any newspaper or any magazine in the country could print them and you would have no recourse. This would be a denial of your common-law rights. This is a right that is given to you, not by the Constitution because a copyright is a constitutional right, and this bill takes away any such rights you may have.

I do not know just what is in the pending bill, because I have not seen the bill. This is a secret bill, and I just heard about it to-day, but I will say that they even tried to make the provisions of the bill retroactive, and you can imagine just what this means. You would have no rights whatever.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to know, and I believe the gentleman is well advised, to what extent this bill would link us up with foreign countries.

Mr. BLOOM. I thought I had answered that question. I will say, however, I am in favor of the Berne convention. I do not want anyone to doubt that for a moment. I am in favor of going into the Berne convention if we can go into that convention with reservations as provided in the Berlin convention of 1908. I have all the records of that convention, and I have had them translated into English, and I can prove to any Member of this House that if we go into the Berne convention, under the Rome convention of 1928, we will be doing something that we do not know any more about than we do about the provisions of the bill we are considering to-day.

I want the members of the committee to listen to this statement, because it refers to one of the great troubles involved here. They want to take away the right of the Association of Authors, Composers, and Publishers to charge 10 cents a seat a year for each and every moving-picture theater. For a theater of 1,000 seats the charge is $100 a year. Let us see what they get for this charge. They get the right to play at all times all the music that is printed and published throughout the world; not the music that is printed and published and copyrighted in this country alone, but the right to use everything throughout the world for 10 cents a seat a year.

Then this little bugaboo comes sneaking into the picture and says to the Association of Authors, Composers, and Publishers, "We do not want this. We want you to charge the producers, and we want the producers to add the cost of the right to produce the music to the cost of the film." Imagine a little operator who is paying $30 a year on a 300-seat house. The producer of the talking picture, or whatever it may be, comes along and says to him, "I have got to charge you for the right to reproduce this music, and I am going to charge you $5 a week or $10 a week or $15 a week, and you have got to pay it."

You can not get away from the payment of this charge, because you can not use the music without the picture, and you can not use the picture without the music. It is giving to Erpi or the people that may come along in future years the greatest monopoly that was ever established in music or moving pictures or anything else. [Applause.]

Do not allow yourselves to be fooled. You are getting letters from home about this bill just like you get a lot of letters about a great many other matters that you know more about than the writers of the letters; but this is one thing that nobody knows anything about. How many members of the Committee on Patents are here to-day listening to this debate? There are probably two.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. No; the gentleman did not yield to me.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman knows we were only notified to-day to call up this bill this afternoon.

Mr. BLOOM. Let me tell you something about the public library. Here is a letter I received from the trustees of the public library in New York:

[Extract from the minutes of a meeting of the board of trustees of the New York Public Library, Astor, Lenox, and Tilden Foundations, held at the Central Library Building, Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street, New York City, on May 11, 1932]

Resolved, That the trustees of the New York Public Library, believing that any curtailment of importation privileges now open to American public libraries and university libraries would be a severe hindrance to the advancement of scholarship and public service generally, and believing furthermore that purchases of foreign books by public libraries are not made in competition with American editions or to the detriment of American publishers, do hereby respectfully protest against any change in the provisions of the existing copyright law that would tend to curtail the importation privileges of such libraries.

Now, I want to call your attention, gentlemen, to this fact. If you want to know something about the word copyright, they have a word for copyright in all languages, but you have to know the language of the country to know what the word is. If you do not know the language, you can stand up here and say, "Where was the first time that the word 'copyright' was used?"

Now, gentlemen, on May 16, 1932—and that is coming pretty near home—there was a unanimous decision handed down in the Supreme Court by Chief Justice Hughes. If you want to understand something about copyright law and protection, read that decision. Justice Hughes says that a copyright is the right to exercise by one during the term at his pleasure, for his own profit, and forms the basis for an extensive and profitable business enterprise.

These people have this right now, and you can not take it away from them.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BLOOM. I say that we all want a copyright bill, there is no question about that. If we could keep the lawyers away from it, we could get a good bill, but one lawyer puts in something and another lawyer wants to take it out. But, gentlemen, this is not the copyright bill for this House to pass. It would be criminal for you to allow this bill to pass and let it become a law. Therefore, I hope you will not pass the bill. [Applause].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I would not have asked for this time had not certain remarks been made concerning the rights of composers and authors. I hope that this House will not approach the subject with a prejudice against the composers as expressed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

The gentleman refers to a hotel using the work of a composer, and contends that the composer should have no right over his own creation.

I am sure that the gentleman from Kansas would be the first to protest if we were to pass a bill permitting any hotel to take the cheese and eggs away from the farmer when they had not been paid for by the hotel proprietor.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield now. It is by law only that we can protect the creation of the composers and authors. Of course, it is a monopoly. The law creates the monopoly. That is the way the law provides protection for the author and composer. I have not heard any protest against giving an inventor a monopoly in any mechanical device. There is not a word of protest being said as to the exclusive right given the inventor over the invention to reproduce music mechanically, and yet because the music or composition of a composer or author seems to be something probably intangible, that contention is urged. Why should this distinction be made?

Would anyone urge the right to use a patented article without paying for it; and yet, without a blush, without any hesitancy, it is urged here that the radio use of a musical composition should be given the public, regardless of the rights of authors or composers. I do not see how you can distinguish between the two. In considering a bill of this kind we naturally have a great many complications.

When copyright was originally written into the law, there could be only a personal reproduction of that work, whether a play or music or copies of the work made. Now we have visual and sound mechanical reproduction, and it is necessary to keep the copyright law abreast of the times and protect the creators of music and literary work in the mechanical reproduction of their creation. If the bill does that, well and good. But the bill is not fair to authors and composers. The common-law rights of authors and composers are taken from them in this bill. I believe that is not necessary and, of course, shall resist that provision in the bill. I would like to see a bill brought before this House where any common-law right involving property is taken away. There would be a protest from every lawyer in the House. I appeal that in the consideration of this bill we should not overlook the inherent right of the creator, whether he is an author or a composer. It seems to me that this talk that because a sheet of music is sold there passes with it all of the right to use it in any way, shape, or form, is contrary to any fundamental property right. The same is true of a phonograph record or a celluloid film. If they are sold for a limited specific use, such limitations must be respected.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I have not heard anybody differing with the gentleman on the fundamentals of this thing. It is just a question of degree—how far are you going to go with the thing? The gentleman does not believe in going into a little lunch counter where there is a receiving radio set, which a customer may turn on, and then holding the owner liable to pay a royalty on the music that comes over the radio set, does he?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It all depends on the facts in each case. The lunch-counter man has no more right to disregard the ownership of music or the ownership of a copyright than he has to disregard a patent right. He could not manufacture and sell parts of his radio set, which he may easily copy. Why? Because he purchased the radio for his own use only. It is the same with music or a literary work.

Then the proviso in section 13 is unfair. Why should the owner of a mechanical patent be given the right to sell the right to reproduce a copyright work? That section, too, will be opposed. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to send this bill back to the committee. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] pointed out, there is no pressing urgency for the bill. The question of adhering to the Berne convention has been often stated as the reason for haste. Well, a great many things have happened since last year. I now hear that England will not continue within the convention unless registration is provided for. That same question has held the attention of a great many in this country. I do not believe it may properly be construed as criticism of the committee if this bill should be referred back. I know they labored long and patiently on it. The mere fact that there is anything but agreement among the committee members is good and sufficient reason, I believe, to refer the bill back for further study and consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

COPYRIGHT GRANTED TO AUTHORS

SECTION 1. Authors are secured copyright in all their writings and the component parts thereof subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. As I said in the last few words of my remarks before, and has been said by every speaker on the floor this afternoon, we are all in favor of a copyright bill. There is no question about that; but this bill has not been properly considered by the Patents Committee or in the hearings before the committee. I did not know until a few minutes before the bill came up to-day that it was going to come up at all. No member of the committee knew the bill was going to come up. Perhaps the chairman did, I do not know. I think if the bill were given proper consideration and attention, if all the members of the Patents Committee would sit in the hearings and listen to the testimony of people directly interested, if they would make a study of the real requirements of a real copyright bill, that we could get a copyright bill that would allow us to enter the Berne convention. You can not enter the Berne convention at any time if you have a copyright contingent upon any formality, and this bill is full of formality, so that it destroys the original intent of the chairman of the committee. Therefore, gentlemen, I believe if proper consideration and hearing were given to the bill in committee and it reported out a good bill that every Member of the House would be willing to pass that kind of a bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this motion because of the peculiar situation in which the members of the Committee of the Whole are confronted with reference to a consideration of the bill. It is a rather unique situation, and I am impelled to make this statement very largely because I am a member of the Committee on Rules, and that committee voted for the rule for the consideration of the bill. It is apparent that there is a very great demand upon the part of at least certain industries in the country that some modifications and amendment be made to the existing copyright law. It was apparent from what gentlemen have said to you here this afternoon that there are inequalities and injustices that exist under the statutes in respect to the copyright law, and certainly from the fact that for 8 or 10 years serious and earnest consideration has been given to proposed amendments, it is apparent that there ought to be some changes in the law. I do not know anything in the world about these technical differences between the gentlemen from New York [Mr. SIROVICH and Mr. BLOOM], or the other gentlemen who have spoken here this morning upon this bill. I make no pretense whatever of having any understanding of this bill or what is sought to be accomplished by it. The Committee on Rules had a request for an order for the consideration of this apparently important legislation. That request was presented to your committee by the chairman of the Committee on Patents. The statement was made by the chairman of that committee to the Committee on Rules that this bill had practically the unanimous support of the Committee on Patents. It has subsequently developed by the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], and others, that probably the full membership of the committee did not have what they thought was a reasonable and fair opportunity to consider all of the provisions of the bill, to arrive at correct conclusions with reference to it. If this proposition is a matter of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the committee and Congress for 10 years, then after the committee has brought out a bill, whether it is satisfactory in all details to the members of the committee or not, it seems to me, as the legislation has been placed on the program for consideration, if we are ever going to get any copyright legislation, if there is any necessity for it, that the bill, if it is defective, could be remedied by amendment on the floor of the House.

I am opposed on principle, as a general parliamentary practice, to striking out the enacting clause of a bill, simply because of objection to some of its features. I do not commit myself to this bill at all. After hearing the argument, if the argument has substantiated the injustice of this legislation, I would be one of the first to vote against the bill.

I simply rose as a member of the Committee on Rules for the purpose of stating to the committee something about the history behind the rule providing for the consideration of the bill. What the committee does with it, of course, is of no importance or interest to me in any way.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman realizes that this is a highly technical subject and one that the ordinary Member is not qualified to deal with?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And that it is impossible to write a bill on this subject on the floor of this House. It is impossible to do it with any satisfaction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to that, permit me to state it is apparent to me that it is impossible to write a bill in the committee.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Let us dismiss the subject, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If in the opinion of this committee this matter has not been properly considered by the Committee on Patents, it seems to me certain that if it is against the wisdom of the committee to consider the bill at this time, the proper procedure would be, of course, to refer it back to the committee, and not strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman realize that the committee has held hearings for three months, and that 16 members voted on the bill, 14 in favor of reporting the bill, 1 voting for a right for amendments on the floor, and the other also voting that way? We were told by the Rules Committee to go back and work again, and we did that, and the objection was made that there was no one against this bill except the American Society of Composers and Authors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'CONNOR) there were ayes 71 and noes 18.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GAVAGAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12094) to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright and to codify and amend common-law rights of authors in their writings, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents and Copyrights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents and Copyrights.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

ECONOMY AND BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, I have recently received several hundred letters critizing the present Congress, especially the House. In many the membership is charged with being unfaithful and playing politics, and our action as being an orgy of extravagance. Others express the same ideas in less forceful terms. This calls for a plain and simple statement.

I am informed by older Members that there has been less party politics in our deliberations than for many sessions. Both sides seem to realize that no party program can be put through because the House is slightly Democratic, the Senate slightly Republican, and the President now Republican altogether. Excepting one bill—tariff—I believe practically every measure passed was nonpartisan in character and most of them were supported by many men of both parties. Since organization was perfected there has not been a Democratic caucus nor conference and but few Republican. This ought to dispose of the partisan question.

The letters referred to seem to base complaint on the belief that this Congress has only accomplished a saving of $42,000,000 under the expenditures of last year. No one so believing can be blamed for denouncing us and our actions in the strongest terms, for last year's Congress with the President's full approval was certainly an orgy of extravagance.

What have we done? Turning to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 9727 of May 6, we find a total saving in the general appropriation bills of $563,601,223.35. In these figures the Army appropriation bill was taken as reported by the committee. Since then it has been amended by adding $5,792,284.50, leaving a total actual saving on these bills of $557,808,938.85. To this should be added $42,000,000 saved on the so-called economy bill. Besides these several small items, certain in fact but uncertain in amount, have been added, carrying the total saving thus far accomplished by the House bills well above $600,000,000. This saving is $231,000,000 more than recommended by the President in his Budget message and more than one-third of the entire expenditures of the Government last year if we exclude what the President in his message of May 5 says "is for uncontrollable obligations." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9673.) If our action has been an orgy of extravagance, what was the action of the last Congress, with the approval of the President?

In the message of May 5 the President poses as one wielding a big stick in an effort to drive an unwilling Congress into a saving of $700,000,000 below the sum which had been expended last year with his approval. Last December in his message transmitting the Budget he advised Congress to cut expenditures $369,000,000 below those of last year. Congress was not satisfied with that amount, so they began to cut expenditures deeply in every branch of the Government, appointed an Economy Committee, and set them to work. Then it was that he awoke and announced his willingness to have appropriations "cut to the bone," and asked leave to sit in with the Economy Committee. He now poses as a driver for economy.

Whether we reach the $700,000,000 mark recently laid down by the President I am unable to say. I can say that we have already made savings of at least $231,000,000 more than the President asked us to make in his message transmitting the Budget. We are still working on the job, and I hope will reach greater savings.

When President Hoover entered the White House, the Budget was balancing from year to year and prosperity was promised. In his first fiscal year he and his Congress created a deficit of $903,000,000. The next year, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, the President and a Congress of his party in both branches, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, created a deficit of $2,500,000,000. These staggering sums aggregating $3,400,000,000 have been met by issue and sale of short-time certificates and long-time bonds in time of peace, ten times as many as were issued during the Cleveland administration, of which we heard so much in subsequent campaigns.

Why this misunderstanding and these denunciatory letters? The opinions of these writers were evidently based upon newspaper reports, and these in turn upon the President's message of May 5. In this message he takes credit for the $369,000,000 recommended in the Budget and belittles the economy bill, saying its savings were less than $30,000,000, although the newspapermen figured it at $42,000,000. He did not say that the House had saved $231,000,000 more than he recommended last December. Why did he not tell the whole truth when he undertook to relate the facts? I leave the answer to your candid judgment and ask who is playing politics.

In considering these figures remember that "fiscal year" as distinguished from "calendar year" is intended. The "fiscal year" begins on the 1st day of July and ends on the 30th day of June. The last Congress provided for expenditures of 1931 and 1932 ending June 30 next. This Congress has authorized no new expenditures for this year. Our duty is to provide revenue and direct expenditures for 1933 and 1934, so the Budget will balance. "'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished."

The Democratic Members from Missouri have worked consistently for economy. If all the savings voted for by them had carried, the National Treasury would be about $200,000,000 better off than it now is. We welcome investigation.

STATUS OF SUITS BROUGHT BY THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some brief statements showing the status of some Indian bills that have been instituted under certain jurisdictional legislation of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, in 1924 jurisdictional bills were enacted to permit the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma to bring suits against the Government of the United States, in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, upon any claim which the tribes might have against the Government. By amendatory legislation the time within which suits might be filed was extended to June 30, 1930.

All of these suits have been filed in the Court of Claims on behalf of the respective tribes.

I am receiving many inquiries as to the status of these suits, the amounts involved in them, and as to when it is expected final disposition will be made of them.

I am attaching letters, in the nature of reports upon these suits, as follows:

First. Letter from C. C. Calhoun and Frank J. Boudinot, attorneys for the Cherokee Indians.

Second. Letter from W. F. Semple, representing the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

Third. Statement from E. J. Van Court and associates, representing the Creek and Seminole Indians, giving a list of the suits filed on behalf of these tribes and showing their status:

CHEROKEE NATION

May 20, 1932.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: In response to your request for a statement showing the present status of the various suits brought by the attorneys for the Cherokees, we have the honor to submit the following:

Nine separate suits have been filed in the Court of Claims for and on behalf of the Cherokees. These separate suits are referred to specifically below.

Before making this specific reference, we are pleased to report that the report of our auditors has been completed. This report is referred to as the most complete and comprehensive report ever made by the representatives of an Indian nation covering the transactions of that nation with the United States Government, and is being used by the Government in a most helpful manner in making its audit of the affairs of the Cherokees.

By reason of the helpfulness of this report and the work of our auditors, the Government expects to be able to complete its audit before the 1st of next December.

On September 1, 1931, at a formal hearing, at which were present Mr. George T. Stormont and others representing the United States, defendant, and at which hearing the Cherokee Nation or Tribe was represented by Ralph H. Case, C. C. Calhoun, Frank J. Boudinot, Frank K. Nebeker, the entire volume of evidence accumulated by six years of accounting work was introduced in behalf of plaintiffs. It was stipulated that the evidence then introduced should be regarded in all Cherokee cases where any part of the evidence might be applicable. Mr. C. R. Cranmer and Mr. A. N. O. Armstrong were the witnesses for the plaintiffs, and the entire accounting work, which has taken more than six years to complete, was introduced in evidence by Major Case through the witness, Armstrong.

The accounting goes into every single phase of the financial relations existing between the Cherokee Indians and the United States from 1798 down to June 30, 1926. The written evidence is contained in more than 50 exhibits, consisting of a basic report on each financial subject; an intermediate summary of accounts drawn from the basic exhibit on each financial subject; then, finally, a composite financial report embracing all the subjects, and in addition thereto, and most important of all, the accounting conclusions of the expert witnesses, stating what their investigation has developed, and what their findings are, and what they state is due and owing to the Cherokee Tribe by the United States.

It is quite impossible to describe in detail the tremendous volume of these exhibits, but it is sufficient to say that the attorneys feel that the Cherokee Nation cases, so far as financial matters are concerned, have been proved up to the last dollar. This evidence is now on file in the Court of Claims, and copies of all exhibits are now under consideration by the Comptroller General, who is giving due consideration to this evidence in the making of the report and answer in behalf of the United States.

Suits have been filed as follows:

1. Clifton Roll case—Cherokee Nation v. United States, Court of Claims, No. H–47. Filed February 9, 1927. This claim is for $436,803.36, with interest at 5 per cent, and is for money paid by the Government to the freedmen in the nineties (last century) who never were Cherokee freedmen but State freedmen. This petition has nothing to do with the main freedman petition.

Considerable progress has been made since our last report toward getting this case ready for presentation to the court. Reports have been made by the Indian Office showing the number of persons who have been paid and the amount paid to each. Information has been requested as to the amount of expenses incurred in making the Kern-Clifton roll and making the payments thereunder. This information is now being prepared by the Comptroller General at the request of the Attorney General and should be available within the next two weeks. Just as soon as this information is received it is believed that our side of the case can be closed and our brief prepared and filed.

Mr. Stormont has indicated that he is willing to stipulate that this case can be heard by the court and a decision rendered, but with the condition that should this decision be in favor of the Cherokee Nation entry of judgment be withheld until the Government has been heard upon any counterclaims which it may file in connection with any of the Cherokee suits.

2. Too Late Baby case—Cherokee Nation v. United States, Court of Claims, No. J–8. Filed March 12, 1928. Claim is for $8,915,160.20, with interest at 5 per cent, for money alleged to have been unlawfully paid to persons not living September 1, 1902, and therefore not entitled to participate in the distribution. This suit is to test the constitutionality of the act of April 26, 1906, under which a new roll of additional people was made and to whom allotments were given.

3. Freedmen case, Cherokee Nation v. United States (C. Cls., No. K–17). Filed January 17, 1929. Claim is for $10,638,559, for unlawful allotments of land made and money paid to freedmen.

The Government demurred to our petition in this case. We have prepared and filed with the court an elaborate brief on this demurrer and argued it orally before the court on May 2, 1932. Other attorneys present in the court room at the time expressed an opinion that we would get a favorable decision from the court on this demurrer, which we are confidently looking forward to, in which event we feel it means a victory for the entire case, as the facts can not be disputed. We are hoping to get a final decision in this case and in the Clifton Roll case within the next 12 months.

4. Trust fund—Cherokee Nation v. United States (C. Cls., No. L–46). Filed February 18, 1930. Claim is for $669,793.05, which includes interest at 5 per cent to June 30, 1926, for money alleged to have been unlawfully paid out of trust funds of the Cherokees.

5. Suit No. L–174, filed May 9, 1930: (1) For the Eastern Cherokees, and (2) for the Western Cherokees. The petition in this suit contains two counts:

A. For and on behalf of the Eastern Cherokees involving a restatement of interest amounting to $2,653,596.12; and

B. For the benefit of the Western Cherokees, involving a restatement of interest amounting to $362,687.01.

6. Suit No. L–257, filed June 26, 1930, for shortage of land. This claim is for a shortage of land, and is for a balance of 575-082.23 acres of land described in the Cherokee patent of 1838, which has not been accounted for.

7. Suit No. L–266, filed June 28, 1930. This claim is for land embraced in the "outlet" and "promised" as stated in the first article of the treaty of 1846, amounting to at least the acreage contained in the panhandle of Oklahoma west of 100°, or approximately 3,000,000 acres, which, at $1.25, would amount to $3,750,000.

8. Suit No. L–267, filed June 28, 1930. This suit has two counts:

(1) Claim for money paid to intermarried whites, with interest from date of payment at 5 per cent per annum, $69,000.

(2) Claim for money paid for intruder improvements, $250,000.

9. Suit No. L–268, filed June 28, 1930, general accounting petition. This suit involves a general accounting, challenging many items erroneously expended from tribal funds without authority of law or treaty not extending beyond a period beginning in 1902. Twenty-eight specific claims.

We are expecting to begin with the preparation of some of the other cases even before the Government's audit is completed. After this audit is completed we will be able to proceed with the preparation and argument of the other cases just as soon as they can be prepared by us and the Government's attorneys.

In this connection, on behalf of our clients, we desire to express the very deep appreciation of ourselves and our associates for the invaluable services you have upon all occasions rendered to the Cherokees.

From our knowledge of the subject we can truthfully say that the Cherokees and all of the Indians of your State and the entire country have never had a more loyal and helpful friend in our Congress than you have been upon all occasions. Your fine sense of justice and thorough knowledge of Indian affairs has enabled you to win out for the Indians where others with less experience and information would have failed, for all of which we are deeply grateful.

Very respectfully submitted.

C. C. CALHOUN,
FRANK J. BOUDINOT,
For and on behalf of the Attorneys for the Cherokees.

MARCH 31, 1932.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: I hand you herewith a copy of our brief on the Government's demurrer in the Cherokee Freedmen case which you have been good enough to freely and helpfully advise me about.

I regret to have had to make this brief so lengthy, but exceedingly important questions are involved, and I hope to get a decision by the court on this demurrer which will practically settle the case.

I took the liberty of quoting quite freely from one of your very able and excellent briefs filed for the Cherokees some years ago. I think your argument is as unanswerable now as it was then.

I wish to take advantage of this occasion to express the very deep appreciation of my associates, and particularly of myself, of the great and intelligent service you have so frequently rendered for and on behalf of our clients, the Cherokees. Speaking personally and from an extensive knowledge, I wish to say that the Cherokees and all of the Indians of our county have never had a more loyal and helpful friend in our Congress than you have proven yourself to be upon all occasions. You have been strong in your advocacy for justice and fair dealings with the Indians, and have always protested strongly against any injustice and wrongs which have been done the Indians, particularly the Cherokees and the other Indians of your State. I have a sense of personal gratitude to you for the services you have rendered my clients and take advantage of this occasion to express it.

Very sincerely yours,

C. C. CALHOUN.

APRIL 12, 1932.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Representing the Cherokees, I have been in Washington continuously since you were first elected to Congress and desire not only to agree with the statements made by Mr. Calhoun but to further state in my own behalf that it has been through your efforts that we have been able to secure the enactment of legislation through which the claims of the Cherokees, in nine suits, are now pending in the Court of Claims, and to say that no one could have been more loyal or rendered at all times more effective service. You have secured for us all of the legislation required to present these claims to the court.

Yours very truly,

FRANK J. BOUDINOT.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS

Washington, D. C., May 7, 1932.

Re: Choctaw and Chickasaw cases pending in Court of Claims.
Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Replying to your request of recent date that you be advised as to the present status of the cases pending in the Court of Claims in which the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations are plaintiffs, I wish to give you the following statement:

In case H–37, involving approximately $4,880,339.97, for original freedmen allotments, Mississippi Choctaw per capita payments, and railroads, the record for trial has been completed and we confidently expect the case to be on the October, 1932, docket of the court for final trial.

In case No. F–181, involving $525,508.81, and being a suit for the value of lands allotted to freedman minors, and lands given to negroes as preferential filings, all testimony has been taken and the record for trial completed. We also expect to have this case on the trial calendar for the October term of the court.

In case No. F–182, involving $175,000 paid to former Senator Owen as attorney's fee for the Mississippi Choctaws, all testimony has been taken and the case is likewise ready for trial. We expect to have it on the October, 1932, assignment.

In all other cases pending in the Court of Claims we are waiting for reports either from the Department of the Interior or the General Accounting Office, and for your information in this connection we wish to say that under date of April 27, 1932, we were informally advised by the Department of Justice that the estimated dates on which reports would be forthcoming from the General Accounting Office are as follows, to wit:

K–260. For accounting, June, 1932.

J–231. For $468,000, one-fourth and three-fourths apportionment of funds, July, 1932.

K–281. Involving $750,000 fee paid Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish fee, August, 1932.

J–620. Cola lands case, $8,830,000, December, 1932.

L–253. For accounting on coal royalties, October, 1932.

K–187. One million dollars for funds used in contract schools, etc., October, 1932.

In case L–261, I wish to say that this case was on the calendar for oral argument on the 2d day of May, 1932, and I appeared and argued the case for the nations on a demurrer filed by the Government.

The work of getting these cases ready for trial has been attended by many difficulties. As you know, the work has been unavoidably retarded by reason of the fact that Congress has passed a large number of jurisdictional bills authorizing numerous tribes to bring suits in the Court of Claims, and the Department of Justice could not go to trial in any of our cases until reports were filed with the court from both the General Accounting Office and the Interior Department. We have been persistent and unflagging in our efforts to get reports from these offices, and as above indicated, we have finally succeeded in getting reports in several of our cases and will go to trial at the October, 1932, term of the Court of Claims.

I feel that it is due to you to say in this connection that you have rendered very valuable services to us at all times in pressing these matters with the departments. Without your active cooperation we would certainly not be as far advanced as we now are with our cases, and I thank you very much for the interest you have taken in these matters and the assistance you have rendered.

Yours truly,

W. F. SEMPLE,
Special Attorney for Choctaw Nation.

CREEK NATION

There have been filed on behalf of the Creek Nation petitions in the following suits:

1. F-168 (filed May 20, 1926). This is known in the office as the Fort Jackson case. This suit is brought for lands taken under the treaty of 1814. This treaty makes no provision for payment of lands. On January 10, 1927, a demurrer to the petition was sustained by the Court of Claims on the ground that the claim did not come within the jurisdictional bill and an application was made for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the same was denied. A bill is now pending before Congress to have the Court of Claims make a report to Congress as to the amount which in fairness and justice the United States should pay for these lands.

2. F-205 (filed July 3, 1926). This is known in the office as the Creek-Oklahoma Boundary case. This suit was brought for a strip of land along the western boundary of the present lands of the Creek Nation, which was opened to homesteaders through an erroneous survey. This case has been ready for trial since December, 1927.

3. F-369 (filed November 29, 1926). The petition in this case is identical with that in the Seminole case, No. L-88. It involves the questions of the right of the railroads to take what are known as station reservations, now used for nonrailroad purposes; the failure of the United States to collect the $15 per mile per annum charge for railroads, and several other related matters.

4. F-371 (filed December 2, 1926). This case involves questions arising under the treaty of 1896.

5. F-375 (filed December 2, 1926). This is known in the office as the Erroneous Enrollment case. This case involves erroneous enrollment of persons as citizens of the Creek Nation, duplicated and triplicated enrollments of citizens, etc.; the recovery of the value of lands allotted to them, and equalization money paid them.

6. H-510 (filed November 28, 1927). This suit is brought on various items aggregating $569,846.07, spent by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the trust funds of the Creeks alleged to be without authority of Congress. Same as Seminole L-51.

7. No. L-78 (filed March 13, 1930). This case is the same as the case filed for the Seminole Nation No. L-123. It presents a claim the funds of Creek Nation expended for education, construction of buildings, and equipment of persons not children of citizens of the Creek Nation, or citizens thereof. An accounting is requested, and judgment for the amounts so expended is asked.

8. No. L-136 (filed April 26, 1930). This petition presents claims arising from the failure of the Secretary of the Interior to comply with section 15 of the act of April 26, 1906, and sell buildings, property, etc., of the tribe.

9. No. L-137 (filed April 26, 1930). This petition presents what is known as the town lot frauds, and prays for an accounting in regard to them.

10. No. L-168 (filed May 6, 1930). Known in the office as the Alabama Reservation case. This case is a claim for the value of 2,187,200 acres of land which should have been sold for the benefit of the Creeks in 1837.

11. No. L-205 (filed May 31, 1930). This claim is for the value of 2,397.71 acres of land, excluded from the Creek Nation by an erroneous survey under the act of August 5, 1882 (22 Stat. 265).

12. No. L-206 (filed May 31, 1930). This claim is for the recovery of $270,283.71, part of the proceeds of the sales of lands under the act of March 1, 1889 (25 Stat. 757), which was illegally paid by the Creek treasurer as attorney's fees, and which the United States as trustee of said nation failed or refused to recover for their benefit.

13. No. L-234 (filed June 16, 1930). A claim of $150,000,000 for the value of the mineral rights to the beds of rivers running through the Creek Nation, which were reserved to the said nation by the Creek agreement and which were lost to the Creek Nation by the failure of the United States to protect it in the possession of same.

14. No. L-263 (filed June 28, 1930). A general claim for any amounts due the Creek Nation under its trust relations with the United States.

15. No. L-133 (filed April 24, 1930). A claim for money credited to deceased Indians who died without heirs, which money should be credited back to the funds of the tribe.

Preparation is actively going forward in all of the above cases. A number of reports have been made by the Indian Office in these suits. Some of the legal questions have been presented. The attorneys for the Creek Nation, Mr. E. J. Van Court and Mr. Paul M. Niebell and associates, give assurance that they are 95 per cent ready in all of the above cases and that they hope to be able to have all of them presented to the Court of Claims during the next court year.

SEMINOLE NATION

Suits have been filed on behalf of the Seminole Nation in the following cases:

1. No. L-51, filed February 24, 1930. This petition presents a claim for the expenditure of the trust funds of the Seminole Nation for purposes other than those authorized by Congress. An accounting is asked to determine the amounts so expended without authority of law, and judgment for same is requested.

2. No. L-87, filed March 21, 1930. This petition presents two distinct claims, which are set forth as follows:

A. That the $500,000 permanent school fund created under the Seminole agreement of December 16, 1897 (30 Stat. 567), has been mismanaged and misspent by the United States for purposes other than those specified in said agreement. An accounting is asked to determine the amounts so expended without authority of law, and judgment for same is requested.

B. That under the act of April 26, 1906 (34 Stat. 137), the Secretary of the Interior was directed to sell all tribal buildings and other property of the Seminole Nation and to place the proceeds of said sale to the credit of the Seminole Nation. That although the said property was taken over by the United States and converted to its own use, yet same has not been sold as directed. An accounting is asked to determine whether or not the said nation has been paid for said property; and if not, judgment for the value of same and for the use and occupation of same is requested.

3. No. L-88, filed March 21, 1930. This petition presents claims arising out of grants of lands to railroad companies of rights of way through the country of the Seminole Nation. Said claims are set forth as follows:

A. Misuse of said rights of way for purposes other than those necessary for the operation of said railroads.

B. Misappropriation of lands for station reservations for purposes other than those necessary for the operation of said railroads.

C. Nonpayment to said Seminole Nation for lands so taken.

D. Nonpayment of the $15 per mile per annum charge.

It is alleged that the United States, as trustee, has failed to collect from said railroad companies for the lands so unlawfully taken from the Seminole Nation, and has failed to collect the annual charge. An accounting is asked to determine whether or not the Seminole Nation has been paid for any of said lands, and judgment is requested for the amounts so found to be due said nation.

4. No. L-89 Filed March 21, 1930. This petition presents a claim for allotments of lands and the distribution of funds of the Seminole Nation to persons of African descent, alleged to be in violation of treaties, and of the rights of the Seminole Nation. An accounting is asked, and judgment is requested, for amounts found to be so due.

5. No. L-123. Filed April 11, 1930. This petition presents a claim for the funds of Seminole Nation expended for education, construction of buildings, and equipment of persons not children of citizens of the Seminole Nation, or citizens thereof. An accounting is requested, and judgment for the amounts so expended is asked.

6. No. L-207. Filed May 31, 1930. This petition presents a claim for the illegal sale of Seminole town lots, and prays an accounting for same.

No. L-208. Filed May 31, 1930. This petition presents two distinct claims:

(a) This claim is for the value of 11,550.54 acres of land excluded from the Seminole national domain by an erroneous survey of land guaranteed to them under the treaty of March 21, 1866 (14 Stat. 755).

(b) A claim for $250,000 invested by the Seminole Nation in the Wewoka Mission School property which they lost by building same on lands of the Creek Nation in reliance on an erroneous survey of the United States.

7. No. L-209 (filed May 31, 1930).

This petition presents four distinct claims:

(a) An accounting is requested of all moneys illegally paid out to the Seminole treasurer under the act of April 15, 1874 (18 Stat. 29), and judgment is prayed for same with interest.

(b) A claim for $20,000 illegally paid out under the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 402), for debts that were not legal obligations of the Seminole Nation.

(c) A claim for the recovery of $191,294.20, part of the proceeds of the sales of Seminole lands under the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. 1004), which was illegally paid by the Seminole treasurer, as attorney's fees, and which the United States as trustee of said Indians failed or refused to recover for their benefit.

(d) A claim for $15,000 for a mill to have been furnished under the treaty of March 21, 1866 (14 Stat. 755), which was never furnished in accordance with the terms of said treaty.

8. No. L-233 (filed June 16, 1930).

A claim for the mineral rights reserved to the Seminole Nation by the Seminole agreement and the Curtis Act, which rights were lost to the Seminole Nation by the failure of the United States, to protect it in the possession of same. An accounting is requested for all minerals extracted.

9. No. L-262 (filed June 28, 1930).

A general claim for any amounts due the Seminole Nation under its trust relations with the United States.

10. No. L-132 (filed April 24, 1930).

A claim for money credited to deceased Indians who died without heirs, which money should be credited back to the funds of the tribe.

I am assured by Mr. E. J. Van Court and Mr. Paul M. Niebell, and associates, attorneys in the Seminole cases, that work is going forward on the accounting in these cases, that the legal questions have been settled, and that these suits will be actively pressed for trial. The attorneys advise that all preparations are actively going forward.

TO AMEND SIXTH EXCEPTION IN SECTION 3 OF IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (H. Res. 236) on the bill H. R. 8766, to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924, with reference to nonimmigrant status of certain aliens, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

House Resolution 236

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8766, "A bill to amend the sixth exception in section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 with reference to nonimmigrant status of certain aliens."

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman, and ranking minority member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House, with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it is the intention, if possible, to adjourn Friday until next Tuesday. In order to do that, it will be necessary to take up the Steagall bank guaranty bill to-morrow at the conclusion of the memorial exercises. In order to do that, it will be necessary to amend the resolution.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the present consideration of a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 237

Resolved, That the proceedings whereby House Resolution 219 was agreed to by the House on May 10, 1932, be, and the same is hereby, vacated, and said resolution is hereby amended by striking out all after the resolve and inserting the following:

"That on Wednesday, May 25, 1932, immediately after the approval of the Journal, the House shall stand at recess for the purpose of holding memorial services as arranged by the Committee on Memorials under the provisions of clause 40a of Rule XI. The order of exercises and proceedings of the service shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and all Members shall be given the privilege of extending their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD At the conclusion of the proceedings the Speaker shall call the House to order. Business in order under clause 7 of Rule XXIV shall be dispensed with for the day."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do we understand from the majority leader that, if this resolution is adopted, the gentleman will later ask for an adjournment on Friday until Tuesday?

Mr. RAINEY. If we finish with the Steagall bill on Friday night, and I think we can get through with it, if we have general debate to-morrow only on the bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what provision will be made for the consideration of the Private Calendar?

Mr. RAINEY. I will propound a unanimous-consent request soon to cover that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are we to correctly understand that the Democratic Party, which with one magic sweep of the wand was to cure all of the depression and unemployment, does not now have any legislation to bring before the House and on Friday is proposing to adjourn over until Tuesday?

Mr. RAINEY. We are greatly hindered in the House by the fact a Republican Senate does not discharge the duties imposed on it. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Where is your relief legislation? There has been no substantial relief legislation brought before the House.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I came into the Chamber just as the rule was being read. I did not arrive early enough to learn whether or not under general debate it would be possible to discuss things other than the bill in question.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the debate shall be confined to the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I believe I shall object. In answer to the Democratic leader, the delay in the other body is not caused by Republican Senators but by embargo-tariff Democratic Senators, as the roll calls and RECORD show.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound again the unanimous-consent request I submitted earlier in the day, to which I understood there is no objection.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday it shall be in order to recess until 8 p. m., and from 8 p. m. until 10.30 p. m. it shall be in order to consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, under the old rule, commencing with the starred bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, under the old rule on the Private Calendar one objection would practically destroy the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. That is the old rule, but it does not destroy the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not destroy the bill; the bill stays on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the unanimous-consent request.

The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that it shall be in order Thursday to take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., and from 8 o'clock to 10.30 p. m. it shall be in order to consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, beginning with the starred bill. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I wish to state to the gentleman from Illinois that Thursday evening a group of Members have called a meeting which is to be held in the caucus room of the House Office Building, at which we are going to discuss the necessity of relief legislation.

Mr. Green of the American Federation of Labor, a representative of the farm organizations, and an economist have been invited to talk. If we were to hold a session the same evening, it might be understood that theer is apposition to getting facts and information on conditions throughout the country.

May I suggest having the meeting Friday night?

Mr. RAINEY. We want to adjourn if we can from Friday over the following Monday.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the meeting be arranged for to-morrow, Wednesday? It will be misunderstood if it is held on Thursday.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to accommodate the gentleman. A session Wednesday will be all right with me if it is agreeable generally.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I amend the request and ask it for to-morrow, Wednesday.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, there are several stars on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the call would begin with the last star on the calendar. If the Chair may be indulged, the Chair will state that, in his opinion, there should be an opportunity to pass bills in the House of Representatives where there is no objection to them, and as the Chair understands the request, it is that we consider tomorrow night, commencing at 8 o'clock and continuing until 10.30, bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to beginning with the last starred bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Under the old rule?

The SPEAKER. Under the old rule; that is, bills unobjected to will be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is the purpose to disregard the new rule entirely?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas demands the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENDING THE TAXING POWER OF NEVADA

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, at the request of the city of Las Vegas, Nev., I introduced a bill, which I insert at this point and which I have had under consideration for some time, providing that the taxing power of the State of Nevada be extended over the Boulder Canyon area to include non-Government property. To-day I received a telegram reading as follows:

LAS VEGAS, NEV., May 24, 1932.

Hon. SAMUEL S. ARENTZ,
House of Representatives, Washington:

During six months previous to May 1 Las Vegas cared for 2,356 indigent men who came here hoping to find work at dam. More than 7,300 meals served. Have, in addition, cared for 445 families, representing more than 2,200 people. This combined service has cost community more than $6,000. In addition, county hospital has cared for many transient indigents at a cost approximately $10,000. Figures include only most needy cases. Many seek and obtain alms on streets. Employment seekers are not allowed to enter dam reservation, thus forcing all indigent care on Las Vegas. Six Companies have not given one cent for such work.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

H. R. 11945

A bill to provide that tax laws of Nevada and Arizona shall apply to construction and reserved areas at Boulder Dam

Be it enacted, etc., That the Boulder Dam project act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 22. Within areas in Nevada and Arizona in which construction is to be done under this act, or which are withdrawn or reserved to carry out the provisions of this act:

"The laws of the State where the property is located or where income is earned shall apply to the taxation of real or personal property not owned by the United States, and to the taxation of incomes."

I want to say that the bill which I have introduced provides for the taxing of non-Government property by the State of Nevada and subdivisions thereof so that, through such revenue collected, private business, including the Government contractors, may participate in bearing some of the expense in carrying on State and county functions. The bill is at the present time on the Consent Calendar, No. 341, and I sincerely hope that gentlemen who are inclined to object to this bill for lack of knowledge concerning same will study this bill between now and the time the Consent Calendar is taken up, and I ask them to help me have this legislation passed before we adjourn Congress. Time does not permit me to acquaint you with the school situation.

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of California. What does the gentleman mean by non-Government property? What property will it tax?

Mr. ARENTZ. It will tax the contractors' property; it will tax all of the permittees and all property except that property owned by the Federal Government. All of the other property should be taxed.

Mr. EVANS of California. In other words, it will tax the property of the Six Companies and other contractors who are there temporarily for the construction of this dam?

Mr. ARENTZ. Absolutely.

Mr. EVANS of California. And those properties are taxed at the place where these companies are resident?

Mr. ARENTZ. No. My bill provides for taxing property located in Nevada the same as property located anywhere else in the State.

[Here the gavel fell.]

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, all Members of the House who are in favor of paying the adjusted-service certificates should sign the petition on the Speaker's desk at once. If the petition is not signed by 145 Members within the next few days, it will be impossible for the subject to be given consideration this session of Congress. Ninety-one Members have already signed it. A Member believing in any form of payment, interest reduction, or any other change in the adjusted-service certificate law should sign this petition and obtain consideration of the subject. When the bill comes before the House amendments may be offered. Any plan will be considered. If such consideration is not obtained, no plan can be voted upon. If you are opposed to the plan presented by the 10 members of the Ways and Means Committee, but favor some form of payment, interest reduction, or other change in the law you should sign the petition. Then when the bill is presented your plan may be offered as an amendment.

EXPANSION OF THE CURRENCY

We desire to get consideration of the bill providing for a controlled expansion of the currency and the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. Allowing the people to incur more debts will not be as helpful as the distribution of $2,000,000,000 in money in payment of this just debt, which has already been confessed by the Congress.

This money will go into every city, town, and community. If we adopt a billion-dollar public-building program, one city in my district will get a $50,000 post-office building. If our plan is adopted, the veterans in every county of my district will get the money due them. The total will be approximately seven or eight million dollars, and the veterans in the county in which the new post-office building would be located would get $250,000. A similar ratio will undoubtedly prevail in the average congressional district.

Much has been said about more money being in circulation to-day than in 1929 and therefore there is no need of currency expansion. Although there is more money outside of the banks and the Treasury than there was in 1929, it is not circulating. I doubt that we have more than a billion dollars in actual circulation. About 90 per cent of the business of the country is done on bank checks or credit. In arriving at the amount of money or credit that the country needs, the amount of work that is being done by money or credit should be taken into consideration. In other words, it is the turnover that counts. In 1929 all money and bank deposits turned over twenty-five times. In 1931 they turned over only thirteen times.

I invite your attention to the difference in the velocity of money and checks in 1929 and 1931:

Bank deposits	$60,000,000,000
Money in circulation[1]	4,500,000,000
	64,500,000,000

Multiply this figure by 25, because it turned over twenty-five times during the year 1929. Therefore the amount of work done by all credit and checks during 1929 was $1,612,500,000,000.

1931

Bank deposits	$45,000,000,000
Money in circulation[1]	5,500,000,000
	50,500,000,000

[1] Outside of Treasury and banks presumed to be in circulation.

Multiply this figure by 13, because it turned over thirteen times during the year 1931. In other words, the velocity of money had slowed up from a turnover of twenty-five times a year to thirteen times a year. The amount of work done by both checks and money during the year 1931 was $656,500,000,000.

It will be noticed that money and credit were doing about one-third the work in 1931 as they were doing in 1929. The velocity of credit and money is less now than in 1931. There is only one way to make up for lack of velocity, and that is by increasing the volume. Two billion dollars will be a basis for $20,000,000,000 new credit. The additional money will come into competition with the money now outstanding and cause an increase in its velocity. Prices will commence to rise and there will be some incentive for people to invest their money. There is no incentive to invest money on a declining market. On a declining market money gets more valuable every day without investing it. On a rising market a hoarded dollar becomes less valuable each day.

INFLATED DEBTS CAN NOT BE PAID WITH DEFLATED PRICES

The people are complaining about taxes being so high. They have a right to complain. Taxes have become doubly high because the value of the dollar has been doubled. Our economic problems can not be solved without giving attention to the purchasing power of money.

EQUAL DISTRIBUTION OF MONEY

It will take about $2,200,000,000 to pay the remainder due on the adjusted-service certificates. We have sufficient idle gold in the Treasury to authorize the distribution of this amount of money and still have more than 40 per cent gold behind all of our paper currency.

February 18, 1932, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date a statement showing the amount of money the veterans in each county in the United States will receive in the event of the passage of this bill. Remember, if this money is not paid now practically all of it will be consumed by the payment of interest to the Government and banks on prior loans.

TWO BILLIONS NOT TOO MUCH

The debts of the Nation, including national, State, county, city, corporation, installment purchases, and other debts, amount to approximately $203,000,000,000. Our money and credit are doing about $1,000,000,000,000 less work now than in 1929. Therefore no one can contend that the distribution of $2,000,000,000 more money will cause an undue expansion, although it will be a basis for $20,000,000 of new credit.

Money is not in the hands of producers and consumers. If our plan is adopted, money will be placed into the hands of consumers who can purchase from producers.

H. J. RES. 394

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I answer the propaganda given to the press by the president of the Chicago Board of Trade in opposition to House Joint Resolution 394 which I introduced in this House on May 19, 1932, and which is pending before the Banking and Currency Committee.

The president of the Chicago Board of Trade, Mr. Peter B. Carey, recently gave out to the press considerable misinformation in his effort to prevent the passage of legislation for increasing the exportation of wheat and cotton to foreign countries. As I introduced one of these bills, I feel that he expects me to make a reply.

Mr. Carey's statement may be summed up in a few words:

First. That the Federal Farm Board's administration of the marketing act has depressed wheat prices to the lowest levels in the history of this country, resulting in great losses to the wheat producer.

Second. That the Chicago Board of Trade, built up by its members over a period of 75 years, has been the wheat farmers' protection in getting the best price for wheat.

Third. That the Chicago Board of Trade has at least six members who could take the Farm Board's wheat stocks on hand and immediately market them at gradually higher prices and get this surplus out of the way.

ANSWER I

The answer to No. 1 is that for the first time in history wheat prices in Chicago are higher than in Liverpool, which before Congress passed the marketing act was always from 11 to 14 cents above Chicago. This accomplishment is in spite of the efforts of the Chicago Board of Trade to destroy the effectiveness of the United States Government agency in its effort to aid farmers and help bring the Nation out of its worst depression.

ANSWER II

The Chicago Board of Trade has earned out of its 75-year history the notoriety of being the world's biggest wheat gambling rendezvous. Raids on the market and corners in the market at the expense of farmers mark many black spots in its long career in market manipulations.

It has often traded in futures, commonly known as options, more bushels in one day than all the actual wheat handled at Chicago in a year. These wheat options in a year will exceed many times the actual wheat produced in the entire United States. Chicago wheat-option trades in a single year have exceeded several times the world production of wheat in a year.

The Chicago Board of Trade for many years has been of no great consequence as a cash wheat market. Its wheat operations—which are very large—are trades in "wind wheat," with commissions that enrich its privileged members; enormous profits to the short sellers. The spring wheat futures (options) are traded in before the farmer has planted the seed in the ground. How is that for price based on supply and demand?

In July, 1920, when the United States Government withdrew war wheat prices, then the Chicago Board of Trade at once began its gambling in wheat options, bankrupting elevators and farmers all over the Nation. Just go back and look at wheat prices monthly from June to December, 1920. Wheat dropped over $1 per bushel. Millions and millions were lost to the wheat farmers of the Nation.

The Chicago Board of Trade to this day denies to a farmers' cooperative-marketing association membership rights to its clearing corporation, which enjoys the juicy commissions on the wheat-option trades. Thus the farmers' cooperatives are obliged to pay fee, tax, license, commission, or whatever you may denominate such charge, on every bushel of grain it desires to hedge in the Chicago futures market.

That is part of the 75-year history that President Carey failed to give out to the press, and which should be known to Congress, the public, and every farmer.

ANSWER III

Those six members of the Chicago Board of Trade who he boasts can handle and get rid of the Farm Board's wheat and advance the market at the same time have a wonderful opportunity. President Carey would have the Congress, public, and farmers believe the Farm Board has all the wheat locked up; that the Farm Board refuses to sell its wheat and, therefore, wheat prices are unnecessarily low, and the next wheat crop will bring no return to the wheat farmer.

President Carey undoubtedly considers the Uhlmann Grain Co., of Chicago and Kansas City, one of his big six. Mr. Fred Uhlmann, in a recent interview given to the Chicago Journal of Commerce, stated:

> In trying to analyze values for the coming crop, I think it is well to consider chiefly the size of the crops and actual conditions and forget about the Farm Board. If our figures on the probable carry-over are correct, there will be a total of 435,000,000 bushels of wheat in the United States on July 1, so there would be 355,000,000 bushels of "free" wheat, or almost four and one-half times the amount the Farm Board will have.

Based on the Chicago Board of Trade's wheat-expert member, Mr. Uhlmann, President Carey can now and should turn his "big six" members loose on the free wheat—355,- 000,000, as Uhlmann guesses—and quit worrying about the Farm Board wheat—less than 100,000,000. The Chicago Board of Trade certainly has a wonderful opportunity to help lick "old man depression," if Carey and Uhlmann are correct. A patriotic service awaits them, profits await them, and the wheat farmers will be grateful.

The bill I introduced, however, has no reference whatever to the Federal Farm Board. It was suggested to me by the Secretary of Agriculture, who himself dictated the terms of the bill, and no member of the Federal Farm Board or any of its agents ever even spoke to me or wrote me regarding the bill.

The Secretary of Agriculture is the governmental head of agriculture in the United States. He received information that a large amount of wheat and cotton could be marketed outside of the United States if he had funds to finance the same. The bill I introduced proposes to have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation turn over to the Secretary of Agriculture $100,000,000—or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of financing sales of wheat and cotton in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce with exporting nations.

The Secretary is also given the power—to finance such sales on such terms and conditions and through an export corporation to be created by him or through any existing agencies as, in his judgment, will best serve the purpose.

This would give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to create an export corporation in his own Department of Agriculture or to use any other existing agencies. This might be the Federal Farm Board or it might be the Chicago Board of Trade, if they have any such agency, or any other export agency in the United States, the sole purpose being to get rid of the wheat and cotton before the next crop. Why is this so objectionable to the president of the Chicago Board of Trade?

To add a little poison to his interview with the press, President Carey states that the Farmers National Grain Corporation (an organization absolutely owned and dominated and controlled by the farmers) has a representative down here, Mr. M. W. Thatcher, at $25,000 a year to represent the farmers. The fact is that Mr. Thatcher does not receive half that salary. But, I wonder whether or not it is unrighteous for the farmers to have a representative in Washington when Congress is in session, while it is the height of good ethics and unbiased citizenship for the Chicago Board of Trade to send their president to Washington to oppose legislation offered in the interest of agriculture. It might be interesting to the farmers to know how much President Carey receives.

It may be that President Carey is a man of high motives and free from any selfish interests when he rushes into print to advise the American people, and especially the farmers, that when the Government places in the hands of its Secretary of Agriculture money to make possible the exportation of surplus agricultural products, that it is doing a bad thing for the farmer. But no thinking farmer ought to believe it.

My bill, that President Carey of the Chicago Board of Trade objects to and is putting out poison to defeat, I believe will be of material help in raising the price of wheat. This deflation will not end until the prices of farm products are increased.

The crop now coming on is estimated to be below domestic needs. If our surplus wheat could be moved out of the country, it would release the pressure on our domestic prices and insure the American farmer a better price in his protected market.

Wheat led us out of the depression of the nineties and is still the recognized barometer of farm prices. The increase in the price of wheat will not only help farm prices but the price of all commodities. Our Nation's recovery must depend upon its basic industry—agriculture.

At a time when the Government is loaning billions of dollars to encourage the people to take heart and revive business conditions, surely $100,000,000 should not be considered out of line to make possible for the farmers better prices for agriculture. The farmers need emergency legislation as well as business.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, following the two hours of general debate on the Steagall bill, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after general debate on the Steagall bill is exhausted, he may have 30 minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have a rule, which we have so far observed, that prevents these special orders being made in advance and cluttering up the calendar. We have observed the rule thus far during the entire session, and for that reason I shall have to object.

Mr. WOODRUFF. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the subject I wish to discuss I would have been willing to discuss under the two hours of general debate on the Steagall bill, but I have been informed that the rule does not permit that. It is a matter of some importance to the country, I believe, and I am very desirous of making this speech within the next day or two. I will say to the gentleman that there is not the slightest tinge of partisanship in the speech.

Mr. RAINEY. That would not make any difference. We have followed this rule during the entire session and I shall have to object.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the Steagall bill be extended for 30 minutes and that I may be permitted to use the additional 30 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. I will have to object, and I suggest that the gentleman make his request to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Michigan that a rule has not yet been adopted. Such a rule might be adopted by unanimous consent, but up to this time no such rule has been adopted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 6477. An act to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, May 9, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Copeland	Hebert	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Costigan	Howell	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Couzens	Johnson	Sheppard
Barkley	Cutting	Jones	Shipstead
Bingham	Dale	Kean	Shortridge
Blaine	Davis	King	Smith
Borah	Dickinson	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	Fess	Logan	Steiwer
Brookhart	Fletcher	Long	Townsend
Broussard	George	McGill	Trammell
Bulkley	Glass	McNary	Tydings
Bulow	Glenn	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Moses	Wagner
Capper	Gore	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hale	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Harrison	Oddie	Watson
Cohen	Hastings	Patterson	White
Connally	Hawes	Pittman
Coolidge	Hayden	Reed

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to announce that the following-named Senators are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs: The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] is detained in a hearing before the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Chair ought to state that by unanimous consent the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] was to have the floor this morning. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] was recognized, however, it being the understanding that he desires to speak with reference to a bill which he will introduce.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce, on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], and myself, a bill to provide for grants and loans to the several States to aid in relieving unemployment, to facilitate the construction of self-liquidating projects, to provide for the construction of certain authorized Federal public-works projects, and for other purposes, which I ask may be appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 4755) to provide for grants and loans to the several States to aid in relieving unemployment, to facilitate the construction of self-liquidating projects, to provide for the construction of certain authorized Federal public-works projects, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire the consent of the Senate to make a brief statement explanatory of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. WAGNER. There can no longer be any doubt, Mr. President, that before the Congress adjourns it will take action to provide a program of relief and construction. I am satisfied that the Members of both Houses are now determined that this long-deferred action shall no longer be delayed.

It is not my purpose to recite at this time the evidence—old and new—in support of the need for such legislation. If there be any here who still require persuasion, I am sure that an opportunity will be afforded for that purpose. My present intention is to say a few words in explanation of the provisions of this bill, which I have submitted with the approval of the Senators whom I have just mentioned.

The bill, Mr. President, must be read in the light of the conditions to which it is addressed. The extraordinary remedy which it proposes can be appraised only by reference to the aggravated ailment for which it is prescribed.

More than once we have been reminded that the resources of the Nation are intact; that the machinery of the country is in excellent condition; that the productive capacity of our people is greater than it has ever been; that our credit facilities are more than ample to finance a prosperous America. Nevertheless, America is languishing. There is no demand for commodities, there is no demand for labor, and there is no demand for credit. Prices continue their decline, profits shrink and disappear, production is further curtailed, and more unfortunates are added to the number of unemployed.

There is no point in blinking the fact that this tragic evolution has continued, despite the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, despite the Glass-Steagall Act, despite the open-market operations of the Federal reserve system. The press reports that the administration is perplexed by the fact that industry is seeking very little of the newly created credit. It is not at all surprising, however, to those who clearly saw early last winter that the liberalization of credit, no matter how necessary it may be and no matter how beneficial it may be, was alone inadequate to start into activity the industrial enterprise of the country.

I recall that in connection with the consideration of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act I stated in the Senate:

> After the most careful consideration I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that the President's recommendations are alone insufficient to deal with the present emergency * * * that they will not to any appreciable extent provide what I regard as the one all-important essential, namely, work for those who are forced to go idle.

I am glad to see that the President, though he differs to some extent, has finally come around to this view. The delay has made the problem much more difficult; it has, I feel confident, not rendered it insoluble.

We have two definite objectives in utilizing the powers of the Government: (1) To assist the States in preventing hunger; (2) to help in bringing about a resumption of employment and revival of trade. These ends are all important. The methods, of course, are open to adjustment.

In my judgment we should choose the shortest routes to these objectives. To attain the first we should make relief available, wherever it is required with the minimum of bureaucratic intervention. To attain the second we should initiate necessary Federal projects and finance local self-liquidating projects. Such a program will create a demand for commodities, employment, and credit. If the program is ample enough and is vigorously prosecuted, it will help to check price deflation, and when that occurs confidence will not require any external stimulation.

I say with confidence that the bill presented here to-day is well calculated to carry into effect such a program of rehabilitation.

It provides as follows:

First. Three hundred million dollars is made available, under the existing borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, for the purpose of making advances to the States for relief to the destitute upon certification by the governor of the State that there is need for such assistance. The amount advanced to any State for this purpose is to be deducted over a period of years from future Federal-aid highway grants to that State.

Second. One billion five hundred million dollars is made available to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under authorization for additional borrowing, all but $40,000,000 of which is to be devoted to finance the following undertakings which must be self-liquidating in character: (a) Construction of revenue-producing projects initiated by States, municipalities, and public corporations; (b) housing and slum-clearance projects undertaken by limited-dividend corporations; (c) construction by private corporations of bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, and similar projects devoted to the public use which are self-liquidating.

The remaining $40,000,000 are to be made available by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in financing agricultural exports. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation must be amply secured for every loan. Every undertaking it finances must meet the test that its earnings will be sufficient to amortize the cost of construction.

Third. Five hundred million dollars is made available for the construction of previously authorized Federal permanent improvements. This construction is to be financed by a 25-year bond issue and sinking fund, the bonds to be issued as needed to pay for the projects as they progress. The specific projects set forth in the bill are as follows:

1. For the Federal-aid highway systems, to be apportioned among the several States under the Federal aid highway act and to be available as a temporary advance to meet the provisions of that act as to State funds, $120,000,000. The advance made to a State is to be deducted over a period of 10 years from future Federal highway grants, beginning in 1938.

2. For the emergency construction of public roads, $16,000,000.

3. For the prosecution of river and harbor projects heretofore authorized, in addition to amounts provided in pending appropriation bills, $30,000,000.

4. For the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore authorized, in addition to the amounts provided in pending appropriation bills, $15,500,000.

5. For the continuation of construction of the Hoover Dam and incidental works, $10,000,000.

6. For air navigation facilities under the Department of Commerce, and for the construction of lighthouses, vessels, and other construction projects of the Lighthouse Service in the Department of Commerce heretofore authorized, $7,500,000.

7. For the construction of projects heretofore authorized under the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, $10,000,000.

8. For the emergency construction of public-buildings projects in continental United States outside of the District of Columbia, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury from the allocated public-buildings projects specified in House Document No. 788, Seventy-first Congress, third session, for which no appropriations have been made, $100,000,000. Such projects shall be constructed within the estimated limit of cost specified in such document, and in selecting such projects preference shall be given to places where Government facilities are housed in rented buildings, under leases which will expire on or before July 1, 1934, or which may be terminated on or prior to that date by the Government under a cancellation clause.

9. The remainder of the $500,000,000 is to be available for expenditure upon permanent improvement projects to be selected by the President for which appropriations have heretofore been made or shall be made for expenditures during the fiscal years 1932 or 1933.

None of the $500,000,000 fund is to be spent outside continental United States. None of it is to be spent in the District of Columbia, where a large program is already under way. None of it is to be spent upon projects employing convict labor.

In addition to these restrictions, the bill contains the very important provision that both Federal construction contracts and Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans shall, wherever practicable, be conditioned upon the 30-hour week. The construction program, both Federal and local, which this bill contemplates will thus open employment opportunities for the greatest possible number of persons.

This, in my judgment, is as conservative a program of legislation as the severity of the present emergency will permit. We can not overlook the fact that, according to the Department of Labor, there are in 123 cities, containing less than one-third of the Nation's population, more than 700,000 families who are living on charity.

The legislation presented rests on the propositions that the National Government is under a responsibility to cooperate in coping with the problems of the national crisis; that work is superior to doles in dealing with these problems; and that useful and previously planned work is superior to so-called made work.

The relief provision should quiet apprehension of actual distress during the coming seasons. As the Federal and local construction programs get under way they will release a stream of orders for merchandise and commodities which can confidently be expected to bring into activity the recuperative energies resident within industry itself.

The Federal public-works program represents but a quarter of the total volume of construction contemplated by the bill, but its emergency value is far greater. We have lost so much time that it is essential that some part of the construction program be initiated at once.

The Federal public works are entirely in the control of Congress. The minute this legislation is enacted into law they can go forward. We know definitely that the Federal projects will not encounter any local legislative obstacles. They will not be delayed by the necessary investigations incident to securing a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. With the aid of the legislation passed last year the acquisition of Federal sites can be accomplished with great dispatch and architectural work can be expedited. Altogether the Federal projects constitute that part of the program from which we can expect the earliest results.

Furthermore, the bonds to finance the public works need be issued only as funds are required to pay for such works. Obviously, but a portion of the $500,000,000 will be required during the coming year. The carrying charges can at most be a very small amount compared to the $195,000,000 which under the bill is lifted out of current appropriations. To that extent the program of Federal construction authorized by this proposed legislation will help to balance the Budget and relieve the pressure of taxation from the taxpayer.

The President has expressed himself in opposition to the enlargement of the Federal-works program. His first objection is that it involves borrowing.

Every business man distinguishes between borrowing to pay current expenses and borrowing for necessary permanent improvements and capital expenditures. The one is extravagance, the other is investment.

Mr. Hoover has himself frequently recognized this fundamental distinction. He approved the legislation creating a Reconstruction Finance Corporation, although that involved the United States in the direct borrowing of $500,000,000 and the prospective guarantee of bonds amounting to one and one-half billion dollars.

He approved the land-bank legislation of the current session, which necessitates the borrowing of $125,000,000. In his public statement he calls attention with approval to the home loan discount bill, although that may impose upon the Treasury the need for further borrowing. He speaks with approbation of the public-works program now in progress, although that, too, in view of the deficit, naturally calls for borrowing by the Treasury. Obviously, not all borrowing can be equally condemned. The test must be a specific one. Whether the borrowing is justified or not is a question that can not be answered by generalities. Our question is whether the borrowing is justified for the specific program set forth in our bill.

In view of the irrepressible need for employment and trade revival; in view of the saving which can be effected by the Federal Government in securing its necessary construction at the present low costs; in view of the saving which can be effected by removal from high-rental quarters to economically constructed Government buildings; in view of the policy we have laid down in the employment stabilization act of 1931, it is my judgment that borrowing in such circumstances is the essence of economy. In that view I am supported by the weight of opinion of those who speak with authority on the subject.

It is exceedingly difficult to follow the President when he would have us believe that the federally guaranteed debentures of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are any less Federal obligations than the United States bonds which would be issued under this bill. Certainly no investor regards them as different. I find it impossible to believe that the mere device of incorporation can transform what the President regards as a dangerous and confidence-destroying bond into an altogether beneficial debenture. Words no longer possess that kind of magic.

Fortunately the public well understands the difference between justifiable borrowing and unjustifiable borrowing. It reacted favorably to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It has similarly reacted favorably to the prospect that a public-works bond issue will be authorized. The announcement of the Senator from Arkansas in advocacy of such a proposal was made in the Senate on Wednesday, May 11. On that day 8 out of 12 issues of Federal bonds registered an advance upon the New York Stock Exchange.

The announcement of the subcommittee of the Democratic conference outlining the program now expressed in this bill appeared in the press on Saturday, May 21. That day every issue of Federal bonds gained over its previous closing price.

These facts are adequate evidence of the reaction of the investing public to a public-works proposal.

In his public statement, Mr. Hoover directed a number of additional objections against a program of public works. His criticisms, however, are addressed to an imaginary program of construction composed of projects assembled through logrolling, calling for expenditures upon dredging mud creeks and similar useless undertakings, upon reclamation projects, and upon building construction outside the United States.

Obviously, such a program can not be justified. It would involve nothing but a wicked waste of money. That, however, is not the program contained in the bill presented to-day on behalf of the Senators whose names I have mentioned.

For instance, the building program is limited to places heretofore selected by the Department of the Treasury and the Post Office under the public buildings act. It is further limited to projects within the continental United States and outside the District of Columbia. It is further restricted by the requirement that preference shall be given to places where Government facilities are housed in rented buildings under leases which will expire or can be terminated on or before July 1, 1934. And finally, the Secretary of the Treasury is given the power to make the specific selections.

I submit that there is no room here for the inclusion of what the President calls "unwarranted post offices."

Our present expenditures for a small group of post offices alone, namely, those for which leases will expire or can be terminated on or before July 1, 1934, and where the rental is $6,000 or more per annum, are $4,495,740 annually.

By every proper test there is ample justification for a program of construction which would reduce this type of expenditure for the Federal Government.

Consider as another instance the Federal highway appropriation contained in the bill. That is to be advanced to the States and deducted from future Federal highway grants. It will be used not for the construction of useless roads but to make possible the construction of the very roads contemplated under the present Budget, since it will be employed by the States in matching the Federal funds apportioned to them under the regular Federal highway appropriations. That, to my mind, is a self-liquidating investment in every sense of the word.

The other projects provided for in the bill, including river and harbor construction, flood control, lighthouses, and so forth, are precisely of the same class, respectively, as those prosecuted under existing appropriations. Their selection out of the authorized total rests in the hands of the President and the members of his Cabinet.

There is no merit in the President's criticism that public works provide but transitory employment. Surely transitory employment is better than none. Furthermore, Federal public works do not differ in that respect from local toll bridges and tunnels which are agreed to by the President.

There are other matters upon which issue can be taken. It is not my purpose to emphasize the controversy, but to secure the enactment of legislation. I do want the public to know that the program embraced within the bill is sound and constructive. With the cooperation of the men and women who have a just and well-deserved faith in the high credit of our Government that program will aid mightily in the national rehabilitation which must go forward without delay.

In view of the national necessity, I make the request, Mr. President, that the several departments of the Government come forward with constructive suggestions which will be of assistance in perfecting the bill. Irrespective of the attitude of the administration concerning some features of this legislation, I believe that we all desire that the bill, when it is finally enacted, shall be in a form most adequate to carry out its purposes.

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield in order that I may ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I inquire whether the Senator from New York is prepared to advise us how fast and how far unemployment may be expected to recede under the plan submitted to the Senate?

Mr. WAGNER. I can not estimate that definitely, but I have very great confidence that it will result in the absorption of a good deal of unemployment now existing, providing we get the proper cooperation from the departments of the administration.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Has any estimate been made of the number of persons who will be given employment under this plan?

Mr. WAGNER. We can all make estimates. I think it will be a large number; but I should not want to commit myself to a definite estimate. The Senator noticed that in the bill we have a provision for a 30-hour week, to be applied wherever practicable, both in the self-liquidating projects which are to be undertaken by advances from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and also from the public-works program, which we hope will add considerably to even the normal employment that would result from these projects.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I further ask what distribution of funds for direct relief or Federal aid to the States is contemplated by the Senator from New York?

Mr. WAGNER. The bill appropriates $300,000,000 for that purpose, to be apportioned according to population, as was in part provided in the bill which the Senator from Colorado, together with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], originally advocated; and too much can not be said for the signal public service the Senators rendered in that regard.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the courteous Senator from Delaware will further indulge me, I will add that it is obviously impossible at this time to give expression to any proper critical analysis of the plan submitted just now by the Senator from New York. However, with respect to direct relief it is distinctly desirable to place in the RECORD, close to the remarks of the able Senator from New York, certain resolutions adopted within the last few days by the Association of Public Welfare Officials meeting in annual national convention in Philadelphia with respect to the policies and standards deemed essential by that highly important body in approaching the subject of administered relief.

I ask permission to include the resolutions in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the resolutions will be received and printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions proposed by the resolutions committee, Richard Conant, chairman, and adopted by the Association of Public Welfare Officials, Philadelphia, May 18, 1932

Resolved, That the American Association of Public Welfare Officials believes the following policies essential to the success of any program of Federal relief.

The Federal authority should be one with experience in the field of public welfare and one having the complete confidence of those who are engaged in public-welfare administration, for example, the Federal Children's Bureau.

The local authority should be the State department of public welfare or the equivalent public social-service agency, to the end that throughout the country state-wide programs be set up for the relief of distress.

State, city, and county departments of public welfare should accept this opportunity of raising their standards and meeting their responsibility for the successful administration of whatever program of Federal relief may be adopted by taking immediate steps to strengthen and improve their organizations for greater service.

Resolved by the American Association of Public Welfare Officials, That, due to the increasing responsibilities of departments of public welfare, steps should be taken in the several States immediately for the establishment under the civil service laws of professional qualifications for public-welfare workers and where no civil service laws exist for the establishment of such professional standards through certification, with the ultimate aim of a broad system of certification such as exists for teachers and doctors of the medical profession.

The American Association of Public Welfare Officials has worked in close cooperation with the Federal Children's Bureau and has thereby had an opportunity to observe at first hand the methods and equipment of that bureau.

From our contact we have been able to see that the bureau has had an exceptionally wide and valuable experience in public-welfare administration and has acquired much skill in this field.

The bureau has the complete confidence of public-welfare officials and we desire to record our appreciation of its service and our hope that it may not be crippled by a withdrawal of funds at a time when thousands of unemployed persons would benefit by a continuance of its activities for the public welfare.

Mr. WAGNER. I am sure we will welcome and will have the cooperation of the Senator from Colorado, as we will that of other Senators who are interested in the subject; and, of course, this proposal is subject to adjustment in the course of the consideration of the proposed legislation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from New York. Has this bill been approved by the President? I was just trying to find out. Is this the one that the President approved?

Mr. WAGNER. I have no idea what the President's attitude is. This is a bill which was prepared by a committee appointed by the Democratic conference, and is what we propose. I can not tell the Senator anything about the attitude of the President, except that I have such confidence in the merits of the measure that I am convinced that if the President is doubtful about it now he will be persuaded that it is an efficacious program to help in absorbing unemployment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I just want to say that I have read so many contradictory dispatches to the effect that the President was in conference with some of our Democratic leaders one day, preparing or agreeing to a program of this kind, and another day that he was opposed to it, that inasmuch as I was not in any conference I was just trying to find out how far we might expect this thing to be moved along. That is the only reason I had for asking the question.

Mr. WAGNER. I have no knowledge of any such conference and know nothing about it.

Mr. President, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I also request that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 4755), introduced by Mr. WAGNER, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. BULKLEY, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 4755) to provide for grants and loans to the several States to aid in relieving unemployment, to facilitate the construction of self-liquidating projects, to provide for the construction of certain authorized Federal public-works projects, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) to aid in furnishing relief and work relief to the needy and distressed people residing in the several States and relieving the hardship resulting from unemployment, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make grants to the several States for such purposes out of the funds made available by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, under the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth, and in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $300,000,000. Such amount shall be apportioned among the several States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census. Such apportionment shall be made by the corporation within 10 days after the date of enactment of this act, and the corporation shall immediately certify to the governors of the several States the amount apportioned to each State. The amounts so apportioned to any State shall be available for payment to such State for the purposes of this section until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act.

(b) The aggregate amount of the grants made to any State under this section shall not be in excess of the amount apportioned to such State. The amount of the grant or grants to each State shall be reimbursed to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by making annual deductions, beginning with the fiscal year 1937, from moneys payable under regular apportionments made from future Federal grants in aid of the States for the construction of highways and rural post roads, of an amount equal to one-fifth of the share which such State would be entitled to receive under such apportionment, except for the provisions of this section, or of an amount equal to one-fifth of the grant or grants made pursuant to this section, whichever is the lesser, until the sum of such deductions shall equal the total amount of such grant or grants. Whenever any such deduction is made, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately pay to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the amount so deducted.

(c) Any State making application for funds under this section shall, through its governor, certify the necessity for such funds. In any State having a State department of welfare or charities, such department shall administer the funds granted to the State pursuant to this section, except that in any State in which, in accordance with the laws of the State, there has been set up a special emergency organization for the administration of relief, such special organization may administer the funds so granted to such State: Provided, That in any State where no state-wide board of charities exists, or no special emergency organization has been set up, the amount allotted to such State shall be distributed by the joint action of the governor and the State board constituted for controlling the financial affairs of such State, if such board exists, or by the governor, if such board does not exist.

(d) The amount of any grant authorized under this section shall be paid to the State upon delivery by the State to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of a receipt for such amount, which receipt shall state that the grant is accepted subject to the terms of this section.

SEC. 2. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans (1) to States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, public or quasi-public corporations, and public or quasi-public municipal instrumentalities of one or more States to aid in financing projects authorized under State or municipal law and which are self-liquidating in character; (2) to private limited-dividend corporations to aid in financing housing, slum clearance, or other similar projects which are self-liquidating in character; and (3) to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction of bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, and similar projects devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character. The aggregate amount of such loans shall not exceed $1,460,000,000. Such loans shall be made under such terms and conditions, with such security, and in such amounts and for such periods as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may prescribe. For the purpose of this subdivision a project shall be deemed to be self-liquidating if such project may be made self-supporting and financially solvent and if the construction cost thereof will be returned within a reasonable period by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges.

(b) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to advance to the Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to the amounts allocated and made available to him by section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act not to exceed $40,000,000, of the amounts made available under section 3 of this act, for the purpose of financing sales of agricultural products in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce, but no such sales shall be financed by the Secretary of Agriculture if, in his judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such products.

(c) All amounts received by the corporation in repayment of any loan or advance under the provisions of this section shall be used exclusively for the purpose of retiring its notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations, the proceeds of which are made available for carrying out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of providing funds for carrying out the provisions of section 2 of this act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue its notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $1,500,000,000. Except as to dates of maturity, which may be fixed by the corporation at not to exceed 25 years, such notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations shall, so far as practicable, be issued in the same manner and be subject to the same terms and conditions as the notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations issued pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

(b) No loan shall be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under section 2 of this act to any financial institution, corporation, railroad, or other association or organization of a class to which loans may be made under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

(c) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall submit monthly to the President and to the Senate and the House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a report of its activities and expenditures under sections 1 and 2 of this act, together with a statement showing the grants, loans, and advances approved by it. Such reports shall, when submitted, be printed as public documents.

SEC. 4. (a) For the purpose of providing for emergency construction of certain authorized public works with a view to increasing employment and carrying out the policy declared in the employment stabilization act of 1931, there is hereby appropriated, from the emergency construction fund hereinafter created, the sum of $500,000,000, which shall be allocated as follows:

(1) For expenditure in emergency construction on the Federal-aid highway system, $120,000,000. Such sum shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to the several States by the method provided in section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 21). The amounts apportioned to the States shall be available as a temporary advance of funds to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds. The amount apportioned to any State under this subdivision may be used to match the regular annual Federal-aid apportionments made to such State (including the one for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933), and when so used such amount shall be available for expenditure in paying the share of such State in the cost of Federal-aid projects. No amounts apportioned under this subdivision shall be advanced except for work on the Federal-aid highway system performed before July 1, 1933: Provided, That the amounts so advanced shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of 10 years, commencing with the fiscal year 1938, by making annual deductions from moneys payable under regular apportionments made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of such act, as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That all contracts involving the expenditure of such amounts shall contain provisions establishing minimum rates of wages, to be predetermined by the State highway department, which contractors shall pay to skilled and unskilled labor, and such minimum rates shall be stated in the invitation for bids and shall be included in proposals or bids for the work: And provided further, That in the expenditure of such amounts, the limitations upon highway construction, reconstruction, and bridges within municipalities contained in section 4 of the act approved May 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 23, sec. 6b), and the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented, upon payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds, shall not apply.

(2) For expenditure in emergency construction on public roads during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, $16,000,000, as follows: (A) For the construction and improvement of national-forest highways, $5,000,000; (B) for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, and so forth, including the same objects specified under the heading "Improvement of National Forests" in the agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, approved February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1242), $5,000,000; (C) for the construction, reconstruction and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive, of necessary bridges, in the national parks and national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, including national parks authorized to be established under the act of May 22, 1926 (U. S. C., title 16, sec. 403), and national park and monument approach roads authorized by the act of January 31, 1931 (46 Stat. 1053), $3,000,000; (D) for construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads under the provisions of the act approved May 26, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 25, sec. 318a), $1,000,000; and (E) for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations other than the forest reservations, under the provisions of the act approved June 24, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 23, sec. 3), $2,000,000. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, are authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the foregoing provisions of this section with a view to providing the maximum employment of local labor consistent with reasonable economy of construction.

(3) For the prosecution of river and harbor projects heretofore authorized, $30,000,000.

(4) For the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore authorized, $15,500,000.

(5) For the continuation of construction of the Hoover Dam and incidental works, as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act, approved December 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 43, ch. 12A), $10,000,000.

(6) For expenditure by the Department of Commerce for air navigation facilities, including equipment; and for the construction of lighthouses, vessels, and other construction projects of the Lighthouse Service, Department of Commerce, heretofore authorized, $7,500,000.

(7) For the construction of projects heretofore authorized under the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, $10,000,000.

(8) For emergency construction of public buildings projects in the continental United States outside of the District of Columbia, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury from the allocated public buildings projects specified in House Document No. 788, Seventy-first Congress, third session, for which no appropriations have been made, $100,000,000. Such projects shall be constructed within the estimated limit of cost specified in such document, and in selecting such projects preference shall be given to places where Government facilities are housed in rented buildings under leases which will expire on or before July 1, 1934, or which may be terminated on or prior to that date by the Government.

(9) The remainder of such sum of $500,000,000 shall be available for expenditure upon permanent improvement projects, to be selected by the President, for which appropriations have heretofore been made or shall be hereafter made for expenditure during the fiscal year 1932 or 1933.

(b) The unexpended balance of any sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for expenditure during the fiscal year 1932 or 1933 upon projects referred to in paragraphs (6) and (7) of subdivision (a), or selected under paragraph (9) of subdivision (a), shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(c) No money shall be available for expenditure under this section except in connection with projects in the continental United States outside of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby created a special fund in the Treasury to be known as the emergency construction fund and to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury. For the purpose of providing funds to carry out the provisions of section 4 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to borrow from time to time on the credit of the United States not to exceed $500,000,000, and to issue bonds therefor, to be known as emergency construction bonds, in such form as he may prescribe. Such bonds shall be in denominations of not less than $50, shall mature 25 years from the date of their issue, and shall bear interest at such rates as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not to exceed 4¼ per cent per annum. The principal and interest of such bonds shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and such bonds shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate, inheritance, and gift taxes, and surtaxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

(b) Such bonds shall be first offered at not less than par, as a popular loan, under such regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein. Any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par. No commissions shall be allowed or paid in connection with the sale or other disposition of any such bonds. All amounts derived from the sale of such bonds shall be paid into the emergency construction fund.

(c) There is hereby created in the Treasury a cumulative sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds issued under this section. The sinking fund and all additions thereto are hereby appropriated for the payment of such bonds at maturity, or for the redemption or purchase thereof before maturity by the Secretary of the Treasury at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall prescribe, and shall be available until all such bonds are retired. The average cost of the bonds purchased shall not exceed par and accrued interest. Bonds purchased, redeemed, or paid out of the sinking fund shall be canceled and retired and shall not be reissued. For the sixth fiscal year after the issuance of any bonds under this section and for each fiscal year thereafter, until all such bonds are retired, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of such sinking fund an amount equal to 5 per cent of the aggregate amount of such bonds outstanding on the first day of such fiscal year, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for each fiscal year thereafter, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of such sinking fund, an amount equal to the interest payable on such bonds during such fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit to Congress at the beginning of each regular session (until all bonds issued under this section are retired) a report of the action taken under the authority contained in this section.

SEC. 6. All grants and loans made and all contracts let for construction projects pursuant to this act shall be subject to the conditions that no convict labor shall be directly employed on such projects, and that, so far as practicable, except in executive and administrative positions, no person employed on such projects shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week.

SEC. 7. The last paragraph of section 6 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 6), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Whenever provision has been made by any State for the completion and maintenance of 90 per cent of its system of primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty highways equal to 7 per cent of the total mileage of such State, as required by this act, said State, through its State highway department, by and with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized to increase the mileage of the primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty systems by additional mileage equal to not more than 1 per cent of said total mileage of such State, and thereafter to make like increases in the mileage of said systems whenever provision has been made for the completion and maintenance of 90 per cent of the mileage of said systems previously authorized in accordance therewith."

SEC. 8. This act may be cited as the "emergency construction and relief act of 1932."

CLAIM OF ARTHUR R. SAFFRAN

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report and recommendation concerning the claim of Arthur R. Saffran against the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Charles C. Muse, of Atlanta, Ga., inclosing copy of his plan for restoring and maintaining prosperity by the creation of a permanent national prosperity board, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fort Scott, Kans., praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, and protesting against any measure looking toward its modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Mineola-Garden City-Hempstead (N. Y.) Rotary Club, favoring the laying aside by the Members of the Congress of "every form of partisanship" and quickly uniting to adopt a balanced Budget and a taxation plan that will be economically sound and fair to every group and calling, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooklyn and vicinity, in the State of New York, praying for the speedy adjournment of Congress, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by West (N. Y.) Kartright Grange, No. 1352, protesting against the imposition of a tariff duty on lumber, and the taxing of the automobile industry, crude rubber, lubricating oil, and gasoline, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Leyden Grange, No. 562, Patrons of Husbandry, of Boonville, N. Y., protesting against the imposition of a tariff on lumber, and the taxing of the automobile industry and gasoline, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented papers in the nature of petitions from 226 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented papers in the nature of memorials from 38 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented letters in the nature of petitions from 91 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of legislation providing a pension system for railroad employees, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions from 203 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the balancing of the Budget, the defeat of the cash bonus proposal, the stopping of all "raids on the Treasury," and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, but preservation of the national defense, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the petition of members of the Boston (Mass.) Society of Civil Engineers, praying for support of the President's economy program and the balancing of the Budget, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMIC LIFE

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present a memorial in the form of a resolution from citizens of Cambridge, Mass., protesting against partisanship and lobbyism in Congress, and favoring the immediate adoption of a plan for the reconstruction of the Nation's economic life, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the memorial in the form of a resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas, because of the unprecedented depression, unemployment, and financial deflation an emergency as serious as that of the World War now confronts the country; and

Whereas, judging by results to date, Congress seems unable to cope with the problem of the National Budget: Therefore be it

Resolved by the undersigned women, citizens of Cambridge, Mass., That we record our impatience with the methods employed by Congress in the face of national calamity and that we call upon our representatives in Congress, in view of threatened disaster to our whole economic order, to forget partisan and local politics, to resist lobbyists for special groups and particular interests, and to consider only the welfare of the Nation as a whole by accepting at once some definite leadership and by quickly adopting some plan by which a firm foundation of national integrity may be assured for the reconstruction of the Nation's economic life.

We believe that there can be no universally popular tax bill, and that every element in the country must be prepared to make sacrifices for the sake of our common safety.

Amelia W. Fisk, 82 Irving Street; Carrie F. von Balsan, 38 Monument Square; Edith C. Farwell, 4 Avon Street; Mabel Hersom Jones, 20 Prescott Street; Lena R. Morrell, 40 Avon Hill Street; Mildred Thanhouser, 5 Arlington Street; Mary Wunch, 57 Avon Hill Street; Bettina Kahnweiler, 2 Mercer Circle; Sarah Wambaugh, 22 Berkeley Street; Gertrude B. Ellis, 46 Shepard Street; Carolyn C. Holcombe, 20 Berkeley Street; Marian T. Parry, 90 Alexander Avenue, Belmont; Elizabeth A. Dexter, 536 Pleasant Street, Belmont; Alice M. Morgan, 6 Mercer Circle; May L. Allen, 22 DeWolfe Street; Helen Tufts Baillie, 22 DeWolfe Street; Amina C. Stabler, 303 Holden Green; Mrs. J. Porter Palmer, 31 Concord Avenue; Miss Susan Hildreth, 27 Everett Street; Helen Barnet Gring, 15 Hubbard Park; Mathilde T. Ward, 8 Craigie Circle; Bertha M. Lincoln, 20 Madison Street.

FLOOD CONTROL, LOWER RIO GRANDE VALLEY, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on Monday I offered for reference to the Committee on Printing two manuscripts from the State Department in reference to the lower Rio Grande.

I now present a letter from the Department of State transmitting those manuscripts and ask that it be referred also to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it included in the document, which I hope will contain the two other matters.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did the Senator have those documents referred to the committee with a view of having them printed?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the committee finds that it can be done.

Mr. SMOOT. We appropriate tens of thousands of dollars to the various departments for printing. If we begin to print special reports which the departments themselves are supposed to print we shall get into trouble.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will say to the Senator that I am submitting that matter to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REGULATION OF INTERCOASTAL COMMERCE THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. FLETCHER presented a resolution adopted by the Southern Cypress Manufacturers Association at Jacksonville, Fla., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by Southern Cypress Manufacturers Association at its twenty-seventh annual meeting, in Jacksonville, Fla., May 18, 1932, advocating Federal regulation of intercoastal commerce through the Panama Canal

Whereas there is a bill before the Senate of the United States, known as S. 3643, designed to amend the shipping act of 1916, for the purpose of further regulating common carriers by water in interstate commerce of the United States engaged in transportation by way of the Panama Canal; and

Whereas the control over these rates now by the Shipping Board goes no further than requiring the maintenance of maximum rates while the legislation proposed would make it mandatory for the water carriers to publish and maintain actual rates similar to the requirements of the rail lines by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas it is in the interest of the public that just and reasonable rates be charged that have been approved by a Federal regulatory body, either the United States Shipping Board or the Interstate Commerce Commission: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Southern Cypress Manufacturers Association go on record as favoring this or similar legislation, to the end that the intercoastal rates through the Panama Canal will be stabilized; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senate Committee on Commerce, urging support of S. 3643 or any other bill or bills that may come within the scope of this resolution.

MRS. FLORENCE KELLEY—A NOTABLE AMERICAN

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on April 30 of this year, during the discussion of the appropriation bill for State, Commerce, and Labor Departments, I took occasion to refer to a notable group of contemporary American women—among them Mrs. Florence Kelley, Miss Julia Lathrop, and Miss Jane Addams. Many Members of this Senate have enjoyed the privilege of their friendship. It is already happily clear that their fame, which runs to the ends of the earth, will be permanent. Their lives will be identified with world-wide social welfare.

Within a short time and with startling suddenness the careers of Mrs. Kelley and Miss Lathrop have terminated. They are now comrades in immortality. It is fitting, and I so request, that a brief tribute of Miss Lathrop to Mrs. Kelley, published in the Survey of March 15, 1932, be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks. This intimate testimonial, based on many years of friendship, was spoken in the fleeting interval of time before Miss Lathrop followed Mrs. Kelley to the hereafter. It is fine and uplifting evidence of the deathless quality of both of these remarkable American women.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

[From March 15, 1932, issue of Survey]

FLORENCE KELLEY—1859–1932

(By Julia C. Lathrop, former Chief of the United States Children's Bureau)

To those who read this inadequate page the name of Florence Kelley is well known. Many of you know her as a personal friend and feel for her an intimate affection and a deep respect. None of us can quite bear yet to speak of her as if she had gone away from this world which she so tenderly loved; and the more we consider what she has given to it, the more we realize that she had exemplified a spirit and method of social study and social work in the full sense of the words which will survive as long as those who come after her desire to continue her efforts, not looking down meticulously for her footprints, but in her spirit, heads up, looking forward, as she would wish.

Some of you knew Florence Kelley in her childhood or perhaps you went to school with her. I had no such privilege, but we know that she was born to a conventional and luxurious life in Philadelphia, her father, William D. Kelley, one of the ablest lawyers and most distinguished political leaders of his time; her mother of a fine Quaker family, a woman of an exceptionally gentle and retiring nature. Both must have seen with rare wisdom that this brilliant, intellectual child was not of the stuff to be driven or led in the old way of education, but rather that she must be helped to find her own path. Thus, she received a formal education indeed, but one of exceptional interest and breadth, which she pursued from school in Philadelphia to Cornell University, whose door just then was opened to women; there she was graduated with a brilliant record and thence she went to the University of Zurich. And it should be added here that years later when she felt that for her work as chief State factory inspector in Illinois she needed more knowledge of law, she quietly entered the classroom of the Northwestern University Law School, took the required courses in her spare time and received her degree in 1894.

Mrs. Kelley was an accomplished linguist, and fine translations stand to her credit. Of course she was a Phi Beta Kappa. She was always, by taste and attainments, genuinely a scholar, with a scholar's choice contempt for pretentious writing and thinking. She became absorbed in economic and social study, in the practical as well as the student's view of the labor problem, in public education as the only substitute for child labor, and in all the aspects of the struggling advance toward a just social order.

I first met Mrs. Kelley when she came to Chicago in 1891. She at once became a resident of Hull House, where she lived during the eight crowded years she spent in Illinois. Her coming was timely, and she helped from the first. Miss Addams and she understood each other's powers and worked together in the wonderfully effective way many of us well remember.

Soon a new opportunity opened. John P. Altgeld, who became Governor of Illinois in 1893, was a man of great independence of thought and action; and entirely on his own initiative, so far as I have been able to learn, he determined to appoint qualified women to various administrative and advisory positions in the State service. These appointments, carefully made and nonpolitical, surprised everyone and gratified, at least, the women of the State. The most important and difficult place was that of chief factory inspector, and for this position the governor selected Mrs. Kelley, and as first assistant appointed Mrs. Alzina P. Stevens, of Chicago, a well-known leader in women's labor organizations. A legend exists to the effect that when the announcement of these two appointments was made some one remonstrated in a friendly way, saying that two such "big women" would never be able to work together, to which the governor replied, according to the legend, "If they are big enough for the job, they will get along together well enough." The event proved that the governor was right.

Mrs. Kelley, her assistant, and staff worked courageously and ably in enforcing the Illinois statute restricting the work of women and girls in manufacture to 8 hours in one day and 48 hours in one week, but the statute was short lived. In 1895 the Supreme Court of Illinois pronounced the provision unconstitutional.

Mrs. Kelley remained in Chicago at Hull House, always doing whatever came to her hand—studying, writing, teaching, speaking, always stimulating—until she seemed an essential element of Chicago. But in 1899 she became general secretary of the National Consumers' League, whose office was in New York, and from that office she reached out across our country and beyond for the rest of her life.

In New York she lived for some years at the Nurses' Settlement with Miss Wald, and there, as in Hull House, she gave invaluable help.

It was from this settlement background in two cities that she drew much of her intimate knowledge of humankind, her interest in working women, in children, in negroes, and in immigrants.

In Mrs. Kelley's book, Some Ethical Gains Through Legislation, published in 1905, we find a plan for a United States commission for children, whose scope and purpose was carried out in concise form in the Children's Bureau act of 1912. Its passage was aided by such support from the settlements as perhaps few of us realize.

We all know how lavishly and modestly Mrs. Kelley gave herself, how faithfully she attended conventions and conferences and committees, speaking in that flutelike voice as if she was delighted to have the privilege, praising and stimulating others, asking nothing for herself. She gave herself so unsparingly that sometimes it seemed as if her life was too hard; but as I think now of her life, I think she had much happiness. She was surrounded by friends, known and unknown—she must have felt that. Always her mind to her a kingdom was. She must have had happiness in ruling it for the common good. More precious than all else, she had her beloved family, her sons, her grandchildren. Yes; hers was a nobly rich and generous life. We know its influence must reach far beyond her day and ours.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 336) construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 728) thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4660) authorizing a per capita payment of $50 to the members of the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin from funds on deposit to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 729) thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 4367) to enable the collection of import duties on foreign-made goods entering the Virgin Islands through parcel-post mail, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 730) thereon.

Mr. NORRIS (for Mr. AUSTIN), from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9259) to amend section 106 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 187), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 731) thereon.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 4536) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 732) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. GEORGE (for Mr. ODDIE), from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably several nominations of postmasters.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of John C. Tulloch, of Ogdensburg, N. Y., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 7, with headquarters at Ogdensburg, N. Y. (Reappointment.)

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the following nominations:

George D. Hubbard, of Seattle, Wash., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 30, with headquarters at Seattle, Wash. (reappointment); and Passed Assistant Surgeon Leo W. Tucker to be a surgeon in the Public Health Service, to rank as such from June 15, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PATTERSON:

A bill (S. 4751) granting a pension to Lura C. Fields (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4752) granting an increase of pension to Rinda Hammock (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4753) granting an increase of pension to Nancy A. Mathis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 4754) granting an increase of pension to Amanda Tobias (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

(Senate bill No. 4755, introduced by Mr. WAGNER, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. BULKLEY and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. FRAZIER (by request):

A bill (S. 4756) to authorize the Veterans' Administration or other Federal agencies to turn over to superintendents of the Indian Service amounts due Indians who are under legal disability, or to estates of such deceased Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 4757) applying the powers of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution to aid the States in the suppression of racketeering and gangster activities; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMAS of Idaho:

A bill (S. 4758) for the rehabilitation of the Big Lost River project, Idaho; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. HOWELL:

A bill (S. 4759) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Florence, Nebr.; to the Committee on Commerce.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

Mr. McNARY. In March the bill (S. 4035) for the relief of Frank P. Ross, and the bill (S. 4036) for the relief of Earl A. Ross, were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. After considering the bills, I am of the opinion that the jurisdiction lies with the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be discharged from the further consideration of the bills and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States, submitting a nomination, was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

YOUTH IN POLITICS AND THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mrs. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a radio speech delivered by Otis T. Wingo, jr., on the subject of "Youth in Politics and the Democratic Party," over the Columbia Broadcasting System on March 7, 1932.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Seventy-six years ago the presidential campaign between the Republican, John C. Frémont, and the Democrat, James Buchanan, was terminated, as far as the Princeton campus was concerned, in an occasion of much elaborateness.

A torchlight procession was organized with a coffin occupying the foremost position of honor and notice. At the front gate of the campus an effigy of the Republican candidate was tenderly placed in the coffin and a torch applied, while a funeral sermon was delivered over the remains. The next day the orator was suspended.

Starting a century before that time, in the early years of our Nation, many of the American college and university campuses have been periodic scenes of political activity in support of the national parties, as the presidential campaigns were waged every four years.

The political activity and participation of American undergraduates, however, has not kept pace with the active interest of students in the rest of the world or the contemporary members of the younger generation of America outside of schools. European students are very politically minded and enthusiastically engage in the current discussions and decisions of public questions.

In the rest of the civilized world the nations look to their educated citizens for the bulk of leadership in public affairs, but in America the general tendency of undergraduates has turned to an aloof and sometimes cynical neglect of their inherent duties.

It has seemed to many of our students that the purpose of university life has been to improve their economic and social positions rather than pave the way for disinterested service to the community. This misconception has disregarded the dependence of the economic and social development of a nation upon the success of its political management.

The statesman who shapes the contours of public life builds the conditions upon which depend alike the progress of science and scholarship, which, in turn, foster our economic and social growth.

It is to the good of all agencies that government be efficiently and intelligently operated.

In but a few years the present bodies of undergraduates will form part of the group of educated minds whose responsibility it will be to lead in the discussion and solution of the Nation's affairs.

A serious consideration of the current questions before the Nation, which are at this time of more than usual concern to the general welfare, will not only aid intelligent solution of present controversies but will also prepare a sound understanding and satisfaction of the problems to come.

It is the duty of undergraduate citizens to prepare themselves now for their postgraduate responsibilities.

The best results in political affairs can be obtained by the individual through the party. The 2-party system, a fundamental part of our political structure, calls for the development and adoption of policies and ideals by means of the aid of the party's support and strength.

Trained citizens, who realize their duty in public affairs, can best gain their worthy aims of intelligent consideration of public problems and the efficient and equitable management of government by joining one of those groups devoted to concerted expression and action in public affairs.

To a degree far greater than that of its opposition does the Democratic Party welcome the entrance of youths and trained citizens into its ranks. Always during its history of more than a hundred and thirty years the Democratic Party has been the fort and home of all the people. Always has it stood for government, not only by the people but also for the people—the whole people, and not just for a small favored group representing a powerful interest, as has been the unhappy and ill-fortuned practice of the Republican Party.

Turning from their previous practice of heralding the full dinner pail as evidence of a great and lasting prosperity created and maintained by special permission of the copyright owners—the Republican Party—the Republicans have found that their copyright has expired and that their song has ended.

To offset as much as possible the inevitable repudiation that has consequently fallen upon them—as evidenced by the congressional elections of last year giving the majority of the House of Representatives to the Democrats—the members of the opposition are attempting the criticism that the Democratic Party has no definite program or line of action. It is regrettable that political discussion, particularly by that side which claims the incumbent national administration, should turn to destructive depreciation of the opponents' accomplishments rather than earnest application to produce constructive plans of action and material results.

Rather than criticize our rapidly weakening opposition let us turn to the constructive program of the Democratic Party.

The success of the Democratic Party in the guidance of the economic welfare of the Nation has been instanced both in the eight years of its last administration and in the noteworthy accomplishments of the present Democratic House under the leadership of the Democratic Speaker.

That admirable and effective piece of legislation, the creation of the Federal reserve system by the Democrats, has been strengthened and developed again by the Democrats in their up-to-date, constructive, and encouraging financial legislation of the present congressional session such as the Glass-Steagall Act.

Realizing the inexistence of an actual panacea for unemployment, the Democrats have taken steps to meet such a situation through the measures of Senator WAGNER, of New York. Providing machinery for accurate determination of the extent of unemployment, fixing definite provision for long-time planning of Government projects to enable the incidence of the actual work at the most desirable time, and setting up joint agencies of State and Federal Government to find work for the unemployed, the measures were impeded in every possible way by the administration and, finally, when, despite such opposition, the bills passed Congress through the force of public opinion, the most important of them was vetoed by the Republican President.

The tariff bill of the Hoover administration in its threats and then in its realities has been a potent factor in the depression from which we are suffering. America can not build up tariff walls that create an embargo on foreign goods and expect foreign nations to buy from us. This handicap to recovery must be remedied for the restoration of permanent prosperity.

The people of the world to-day are weighted down with an intolerable burden of armament. At a time when governments are tottering on the verge of bankruptcy this tremendous expenditure goes on, heavily augmented by the huge expenses directly resulting from previous wars. America must return to its former position of world leadership in the direction of a sane movement that will effectively bring about the reduction of armaments and the establishment of peace.

The current situation in the Far East spurs us on to control the war dogs that selfishly threaten the peace of the world. Whatever we may collect from the just debts of billions of dollars owed to us by foreign nations, let us utilize our position as the greatest creditor nation the world has ever known to force upon the world such limitation of armaments as will ultimately result in the thing for which, through the ages, men have longed and women have prayed—the abolition of the means of war.

There is being unfolded now from day to day in the Nation's House of Representatives the picture of what may be expected of complete Democratic leadership of the Government.

The feeble belittling by the Republican politicians of the most excellent work of the Democratic House has been overbalanced by the more sportsmanlike admission of Republican obstacles they have had to face.

The Democratic House has not played partisan politics; where it could accept recommendations of the President it has done so promptly and generously. Where it has felt the necessity of going outside or beyond these recommendations it has the courage to assume responsibility on its own account. What it has accomplished, what it will accomplish, represents to the American people the constructive program and the intelligent administration of affairs that may be confidently anticipated at the hands of a Democratic Executive and a Democratic Congress following the election of 1932.

It is imperative that the Democrats be given complete charge of the Nation's affairs in order that the right principles and practices of Government for the benefit of the whole people may be reestablished. The Democratic Party as the liberal agency of the forces of American public life must extend its liberalism to every problem that confronts the people, not only for the next four years but for years to come. I thank you.

YOUTH IN POLITICS AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mrs. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a radio speech delivered by Donnell K. Wolverton, executive chairman of the Princeton Republican Club, delivered on March 7, 1932, on the subject of college political clubs.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The fundamental purpose of college political clubs is to encourage study of the policies, aims, and purposes of our major political parties.

Active participation in public affairs is the duty of all, and especially of those who have the advantages of education.

How can this obligation be most effectively fulfilled, by acting singly and alone, or in unison with others?

The division of the American people into parties is the result of many years of trial and experiment in government. Experience has proved that two parties are necessary for good government.

Political parties were created not by law but by necessity. Some method of ascertaining the will of the majority on important governmental policies had to be found. Thus parties came into existence as the instrumentality by which the people could express their conviction on declared principles and programs.

For more than a century our Government has been carried on by party machinery. Ours is a government of parties.

Some individuals pride themselves on independence of party obligations, yet thoughtful consideration of what party solidarity has accomplished for the general welfare, which could not have been accomplished by independence of party action, is not only a sufficient justification for our American system of party government, but also a clarion call to the young men and women of our colleges to identify themselves with party activity.

To-day, as I present the claims of the Republican Party for your allegiance, I am proud that I am speaking in behalf of a party that has never sought to win a Presidency or carry a Congress by conspiring with destructive and uneconomic forces.

No student of American politics can fail to be impressed by the record of the Republican Party.

In preserving the Union, warding off foreign encroachments in this hemisphere, avoiding entanglements in foreign politics, expanding commerce, maintaining a high standard of living by protecting American industry, agriculture, and labor, building up the Navy and the merchant marine, improving waterways and harbors, restraining monopolies, cultivating Pan American friendship, limiting naval armament, maintaining the gold standard, establishing the Federal Budget, protecting workers from an influx of unskilled foreign labor, refusing to cancel foreign debts, renouncing war, promoting treaties to insure world peace, reducing the public debt, keeping the Government out of business, and in all other policies, both domestic and foreign, the Republican Party has constantly aimed to advance the interests of the United States and to provide for the welfare of its people.

For 55 years out of the seventy-odd years of its existence it has controlled and directed the destiny of our Nation. During this period only two Democrats have been elected President, while 11 Republicans have filled that office. Truly, it may be said that the history of the development of the United States, since the Civil War, has been synonymous with the history of the Republican Party and its accomplishments.

Time and again in periods of national crisis the people of our country have looked to the Republican Party to supply the necessary leadership to meet the emergency.

To-day the Republican Party, under the leadership of President Hoover, is the only party with a definite program. Democratic leadership has utterly failed. On the convening of Congress in December, Speaker GARNER, as the foremost Democratic official, on assuming the speakership of the Democratic House of Representatives, said: "Ordinarily this would be an occasion when I might express the hopes and aspirations of the House of Representatives in its legislative program, but at the moment I do not * * * think it advisable * * * to make a statement on that subject. At a later date—and I hope at an early date—I expect to make to you a complete statement touching that program." Although nearly three months have passed, there has not been any declaration or statement of program by Speaker GARNER or anyone else in the Democratic Party. This utter lack of constructive thought on the part of the Democratic Party affords a glaring contrast with the aggressive economic program of the Republican administration under the leadership of President Hoover.

While neither the Republican Party nor its leader is in any way responsible for the present depression, the Republicans have met the crisis with a series of economic acts that have prevented our people from experiencing the terrible conditions existing in Europe.

As soon as the depression fell upon the country, President Hoover secured an agreement between capital and labor to maintain the standard of living. Next he launched the country on an extensive construction of public buildings, and thereafter prevented further immigration by an Executive order, organized a national committee to relieve unemployment, prevented an international financial collapse through the moratorium, organized a credit corporation to strengthen banking institutions, provided financial help for industry, railroads, and banks by the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, increased credit facilities by liberalizing the laws affecting the Federal reserve system, recommended measures to relieve depositors in closed banks, also home-mortgage bank system to aid home owners, aided the farmers through extended mortgage loans and additional funds for livestock and seed planting, and established the national credit by the decision to balance the Budget through increased revenue and drastic governmental economies.

These are not all of the accomplishments, but they form ample proof of the splendid leadership of President Hoover and the Republican Party in this hour of national necessity. Let those who would criticize answer the question, "What would you have done that Hoover hasn't done?"

The Republican Party is the party of the future as well as the party of the past and present. It is the party through which young men and women can find the greatest opportunities for making progress as public leaders. As it dominated the past, so it challenges the future and calls to its colors with an irresistible appeal the students of our American colleges and universities.

LEGISLATION BY CONGRESS URGED

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, by request, I present a copy of a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange in conjunction with and on recommendation of the New Orleans Spot Cotton Merchants Association on May 19, 1932, which I ask leave to have published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The continued disposition shown by Senators and Congressmen to vote billions of the taxpayers' money for the support of unsound nostrums and in support of selfish groups and salaried beneficiaries; the continued waste and extravagant spending by our Government; the seeming unwillingness of Congress to face the facts, and to bring the cost of Government down to a practical level; to devote adequate and constructive thought and action to the reopening of clogged trade channels and to the revitalizing of the Nation's economic life—all leave in their wake popular discontent, doubt, and fear among investors, producers, and generators of business, with consequent unemployment and heavy loss.

After the expenditure of half a billion dollars of taxpayers' money and the exercise of the most extensive and arbitrary powers ever granted a Federal board, the Farm Board has not succeeded in helping the cotton farmer.

On the contrary, following the most extensive speculation which has ever confronted the cotton market, the many overoptimistic promises to the farmers, the extension of excessive and inadequately secured loans, and the hoarding of large stocks of cotton, all fostered, encouraged, and aided by the Farm Board, the value of cotton not only has dropped from about 18 cents to less than 6 cents, but the sales value of a pound of United States grown cotton has dropped well below a parity with foreign growths.

No better illustration of the futility of the Farm Board as a farm aid, its exotic policies, and its waste of many millions of the taxpayers' money is needed.

We protest against the continued waste and extravagant spending by the Federal Government.

We protest against the appropriating of any further tax moneys for the use of the Farm Board.

With all the earnestness at our command we ask, urge, and insist that Congress devote its thought and action to such legislation as is required to eliminate all unnecessary boards, bureaus, commissions, and activities, and to reduce the cost of Government to a practical basis.

To promptly take steps to provide for an international conference on customs-tariff reform, in the interest of reciprocal-trade revival.

To provide for reconsideration of the antitrust laws, to the end that wholesome business may make the readjustments necessary to enable it to function efficiently under the new creditor status of the Nation.

To provide for nonpartisan and unprejudiced reconsideration of world debts due the United States before the nations repudiate them, with a view to the swapping of some old and uncollectible debts for new and helpful trade opportunities.

American business initiative and enterprise can not much longer survive the neglect—and worse—of which the economic life of the Nation is now a victim.

Our final request and demand is that Congress seriously consider ways and means of reducing and eventually eliminating the control over Government that is now so tragically exercised by selfish groups and other beneficiaries of waste and extravagant Government spending and for the restoration of such control to the people themselves.

Resolved, That copies of this declaration be sent to each Senator and Representative from Louisiana, accompanied by a request that it be read to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States; and also that copies be sent to all cotton exchanges, boards of trade, and similar associations, with the request that they adopt this or like resolutions.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement appearing in the Washington Herald this morning from former Gov. Alfred E. Smith, of New York, concerning public works.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMITH TAKES ISSUE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S STAND ON PUBLIC-WORKS UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF LOAN—HIGHWAYS MORE IMPORTANT THAN TOLL PROJECTS, LEADER THINKS—REVENUE AND NONREVENUE PRODUCING CAPACITY CALLED MINOR POINT

The President in his letter to the president of the American Society of Civil Engineers has made a number of statements as to a Federal public-works program, on which I have been asked to comment, presumably because I have been strongly in favor of such a program.

Let me say first, as I have stated repeatedly, that I am in entire sympathy with the President as to the honest balancing of the Federal Budget, as to the expansion of credit by Federal reserve banks, as to the continuation of the work of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and as to the general principles of relief as set forth in his letter.

I do not, however, agree with him at all as to the distinction between productive and nonproductive public works, nor as to the distinction between loaning the credit of the National Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other agency and the issuance of public-works bonds.

What is more important is the main thing overlooked by the President, and that is the need of finding immediate productive employment for millions of people. This problem transcends all technicalities, all hairsplitting, and all finespun theories of financing.

The fact of the matter is that we must find such productive work and find it immediately to meet what every thinking person recognizes as the most deplorable condition this country has seen in the time of people now living.

It is clear that private business can not get under way on its own initiative. I think the first thing which we should do is to make a list of public improvements which are actually ready to start, for which plans and specifications are made, which will immediately employ men, but which are not moving because of lack of funds.

THE REAL POINTS

We should include in this list public works, National, State, and local, semipublic works of municipal corporations, and even corporations affected with a public interest. The important test should be not whether the work or project is self-supporting or revenue producing but, first, whether it is needed; second, whether it is ready to go ahead; and, third, how much labor it will employ directly or indirectly.

I am entirely unable to recognize the validity of the distinction which the President points out between productive and nonproductive or revenue and nonrevenue producing work. He mentions a bridge and a tunnel to be financed by tolls as being a worthy project and a highway as being an unworthy one. Obviously he can not mean this.

I do not know of a bridge or tunnel project of any magnitude, whether revenue producing or nonrevenue producing, whether it is to be operated by tolls or free, which does not depend upon connecting and approach highways for its success.

I was Governor of New York when the port-authority plan was started, was a member of the first commission after the plan was adopted, and was subsequently governor when its major projects were gotten under way. Neither the toll bridges nor vehicular tunnel under the port authority could operate successfully if it were not for the money spent on approach highways.

Millions of dollars were spent in New Jersey for vitally needed connections with the George Washington Bridge. The main difficulty with the New York side of this bridge is the absence of adequate approaches. The new Triborough Bridge, which is a toll bridge being built by New York City, will be of little use unless parkways and wide boulevards are built in Queens and the Bronx to connect it with the main arteries outside of the city.

DOZENS OF PROJECTS

Similarly, I know of dozens of highways, boulevards, and parkways on main routes on which construction could be started in 90 days, which will not only employ labor promptly, but will raise property values and otherwise redound to the permanent prosperity of the community and the country.

On the other hand I know of so-called revenue-producing projects which are only revenue producing on paper and which do not have anything like the permanent value of non-revenue-producing or nontoll projects. As to nonliquidating Federal construction, can it be possible that the President has turned his back on authorized Federal projects for which no funds have as yet been made available? If so, why were those projects ever authorized by his signature? Why have plans been drawn for them, and the local communities been told that they will be built?

Let us take another example of the relation between revenue-producing and non-revenue-producing improvements. Low-cost new housing is worthless without sewers, sidewalks, streets, and other utilities, most of which are not self-liquidating or revenue producing. Grade-crossing eliminations save lives and time. They may be vitally necessary.

A loan to railroads or States may get them started promptly, but they don't produce revenue. The distinction between liquidating and nonliquidating improvements simply does not stand analysis. And why should the President fear logrolling or favoritism? The decisions should be up to him. There will certainly be a lot less pressure for unnecessary or undesirable public works than for projects to help private corporations and railroads. No doubt there will be some mistakes and some waste, but the colossal waste and stupidity of the dole and made work will be avoided, and that is precisely what we are heading for if we don't go ahead with public works on a national scale.

SOURCE OF CASH

I am entirely unable to follow the President's distinction between the issuance of Federal bonds and the use of Federal credit. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a Government corporation. It is backed by the credit of the United States. When it loans money to banks, railroads, or other corporations, or, if in the future it is authorized to loan to States and municipalities, it is obvious that at some stage of the game the borrower must have cash to pay the laborers and the unemployed about whom we are all talking.

Where does the cash come from? So far it has come from the United States Treasury, in part through a direct appropriation by Congress and in part by the corporation borrowing from the Treasury. Of course, both the initial capital and the subsequent borrowing is expected to be paid back by those who borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but, nevertheless, the Treasury must obtain the money in the first instance by selling Treasury tax notes or certificates, or by depleting the Treasury balances, so that tax-note certificates or bonds must be sold to defray other expenses.

It follows, therefore, that in the last analysis from the point of view of unsettling the bond market there is no difference between issuing Federal bonds and using Federal credit. I understand perfectly that in the one case the Federal Government merely does temporary financing, because it expects to get the money back, while in the other case it must raise enough by taxation over a period of years to pay the entire cost of non-revenue-producing improvements.

I have proposed to meet the cost of public works by a tax on beer or by a sales tax, or both. No one in his senses doubts that a reasonable beer tax over a period of a few years would take care of as much of a public-works bond issue as is needed. This is also true of the general manufacturers' sales tax.

I may add, incidentally, that it is a pretty large assumption that all the so-called self-liquidating projects entered into by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will actually in effect liquidate themselves and pay back a hundred cents on a dollar. That would be pretty close to a miracle.

ASKS LATITUDE

In any event, I see no reason to quarrel with the President on this subject at this time. Why not give him sufficient latitude to progress public works, both revenue producing and non revenue producing, Federal, State, and local, and also semipublic works? I would prefer not to see this done through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but if the President insists upon it, let him have his way.

If it is to be done through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, let Congress set a maximum sum up to which the President may thereafter issue bonds and let the President decide on the allocation for the different kinds of improvements and the officers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation take care of the details.

The important thing is to provide sufficient credit to get all work under way which measures up to the test that it is productive and that it will employ labor immediately. It is quite possible that the President will find when the plan begins to operate that the distinction between revenue and non revenue producing public works is not as important as he now thinks.

I am, however, recognizing the magnitude of the problem and giving the President the means to meet it. I would give him the power in the broadest possible terms and the responsibility which should go with it.

If we don't tackle this problem now in a big way, we shall be driven to much more drastic measures a few months from now, when the millions of unemployed will not be so patient with quibbling over words.

THE PRESENT CRISIS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Rev. John A. Ryan, D. D., director of the department of social action of the National Catholic Welfare Congress, at a meeting held in Baltimore yesterday evening.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Our weighty office of propagating, interpreting, and urging in season and out of season the entire moral law demands that both social and economic questions be brought within our supreme jurisdiction, in so far as they refer to moral issues."

Thus speaks the holy father in his encyclical, Quadragesimo Anno, issued one year ago this month. He tells us that economic actions and relations are subject to the moral law, and that the church is divinely commissioned to interpret and apply the moral law in the field of economics as in other spheres of human action. In the encyclical just mentioned, Pope Pius XI performed this task for the whole economic order. In conformity with the principles laid down in that document, I shall attempt this evening to apply the Christian moral teaching to the problems of our social and economic crisis.

Speaking of world conditions, Pope Pius XI declares in his latest encyclical: "If we should pass in review the long and sorrowful sequence of woes that, as a sad heritage of sin, mark the stages of fallen man's earthly pilgrimage from the flood on, it would be hard to find spiritual and material distress so deep, so universal, as that which we are now experiencing * * *." Referring likewise to world conditions, the very distinguished and very able British economist, John Maynard Keynes, asserts in the Atlantic Monthly for May, that the most urgent question before us is this: "Can we prevent an almost complete collapse of the financial structure of modern capitalism?"

The crisis has two phases, which may be designated as the human and the economic. The human elements are manifested in the unprecedented suffering of millions of our people, the plight of religious institutions, the losses suffered by thousands upon thousands who are still in receipt of some income, and the imminent danger of violent resentment and uprising unless adequate relief is soon forthcoming. Between eight and ten million wage earners are totally unemployed and several other millions are working only part of the time. A very large proportion of the wholly unemployed have been in that condition for more than a year. The abysmal distress of the unemployed can be sufficiently appreciated when we glance at the following summary facts: In Niles, Ohio, one-fourth of the population is subsisting on a food allowance of $1 a month per person; in Toledo and Tulsa the average allowance for 60,000 human beings is $2.14 a week per family; in New York the amount per family is $2.39 for all purposes; in Philadelphia it is $4.23—of this sum the food expenditure is $3.93, which the social workers there maintain is only two-thirds of what is required for health; in many other cities the weekly allotments per family for food is between three and five dollars. Admitting that the food allowance in most cities is still enough "to keep people alive," Miss Lea D. Taylor, a very able and competent social worker, declares:

"Every social worker and every intelligent citizen knows that people have other basic needs than food, needs which must be met if human values and family life are to be preserved. Shelter certainly is essential, yet we wait until almost the moment of eviction before we give a family the assurance that for a little while longer it will have a roof over its head. What does that do to self-respect? Clothing is presumably essential, yet it figures seldom in relief as we now talk about it. Can families live indefinitely with no renewal of household supplies? 'I wish they'd send a broom and a scrubbing brush with the rations,' said a distracted mother."

Referring to the social workers, Miss Taylor continues:

"Who knows better than we what the continuing depression is doing to helpless people? We know that the courage, the stanch family loyalty, the generosity of friends and relatives, the consideration of landlords and grocers are being taxed to the utmost and are near exhaustion. We see increasing malnutrition of children, heightened nervous tension of men and women facing insecurity of shelter and of family needs. We see mental strain and breakdown, a growing tendency to beggary, the shattering of self-respect and morale, the demoralizing results of idleness to adolescent children who are not in school."

Religious institutions of all sorts—educational, charitable, and spiritual—are experiencing a decline of income and resources, which is greatly reducing their ability to render service. Many parishes are on the verge of bankruptcy. Our bishops are only too well aware of the difficulties and dangers that have been created by the decline of employment and of income among our people. Hundreds of thousands of business men and the possessors of small investments are in grave and genuine distress even though they may be still in receipt of some income. And unless something heroic is done soon to check the continuous downward movement of business and employment the sufferings of almost all classes of our people will become intolerable.

Speaking of the economic reform advocated by Pope Leo XIII, the present Holy Father has said: "Unless serious attempts be made with all energy and without delay to put them into practice let nobody persuade himself that the peace and tranquillity of human society can be effectively defended against the forces of revolution." These portentous words may be applied without reserve to our present social crisis. A few days ago the representatives of the very conservative railroad brotherhoods said to the President of the United States: "We can not assume responsibility for orderly operation of railroads unless relief is given." At about the same time Edward F. McGrady, legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor, a man who has always been conservative in thought and speech, who is old enough to be and is a grandfather and who is withal an excellent Catholic, made the following statements before a committee of Senators:

"Leaders of union workers have been preaching patience. They have gone back to their hungry fellow workers time after time and urged them to do nothing drastic.

"But I say advisedly that if nothing is done by Government and starvation increases the doors of revolt will be thrown open and leaders can not close them.

"The men who have power in Washington seem to think it is enough to keep crying, 'Balance the Budget! Balance the Budget!' I want to tell you that there are two other words beginning with 'b' that are a good deal more important. They are bread and butter. The unemployed want to get their bread and butter by work, but they are going to get it.

"I have torn aside the curtain, so that you will know what is being talked about in every place where the workers gather. They are resentful, bitterly resentful. A large proportion of every gathering is composed of ex-soldiers, and they feel more resentful than the rest.

"If this administration allows Congress to adjourn without providing some relief for the more than 8,000,000 workers who are totally unemployed and at least 7,000,000 more on part time, I for one will do nothing to close the doors of revolt!

"I have traveled through 17 States in the last few weeks. I have talked to tens and tens of thousands of hungry men and women. But I am not coming before any more committees to plead for relief. * * * We, too, have lost our patience."

What has Catholic moral teaching to say about this situation? It says something very definite and very positive. It tells us that when the needs of an individual or a community are grave the possessors of superfluous goods—that is, goods which are not needed for the fitting support of their customary standard of living—are under a grave obligation of charity to relieve all the grave needs that exist. Now, the degree of need that is indicated by the miserable amounts of weekly relief bestowed upon the destitute as described above is surely grave.

If the moral theologians who originally formulated this scientific Catholic doctrine of the relation between needs and superfluities were alive in America to-day, they would unhesitatingly affirm this judgment. If the thousands of moral theologians who have for centuries repeated with approval this teaching were witnesses of the suffering now endured by millions of Americans, they would be unanimous in approving that decision. In a word, the Catholic moral teaching on almsgiving, as it is technically called in the textbooks, condemns the current "relief" as falling far short of the obligations imposed by the law of reason and the commands of Christ.

It would not be fair to include the rich or any other particular class under this severe condemnation. When the volume of distress is as great as it has been for many months in the United States, the obligation of relief can not be fully discharged through individual action or even through voluntary associated action. It can be fulfilled only by the organ which represents the whole community, namely, the State. This obligation the civil authorities have neither appreciated nor fulfilled. Many of the cities have done the utmost that is practicable; several of the States have likewise discharged their obligation in reasonable measure; but the Federal Government has up to date done absolutely nothing. The national administration has minimized the amount of suffering and exaggerated the local resources, while Congress has refused to appropriate even a moderate sum of money to fulfill even a part of its obligation. The words of Pope Pius XI in his encyclical on Christian Marriage, may fittingly be quoted here: "If, however, private resources do not suffice, it is the duty of the public authority to supply for the insufficient forces of individual effort, particularly on a matter which is of such importance to the common weal, touching, as it does, the maintenance of the family and married people."

In the present predicament, the Federal Government is the only political authority in the United States which is capable of providing adequate relief, fulfilling this duty of the State adequately. This implies an appropriation in much larger volume than the $300,000,000 recently specified by the President and by the Democratic leadership in Congress. The resources of our country, natural, mechanical, and intellectual, are more than sufficient to provide all the destitute with at least the minimum of decent existence. That means at least $15 a week per family of five. The miserable amounts which the families of the unemployed are now receiving constitute not only a disgrace to our people and a foul blot on the fair name of America, but a grave violation of distributive justice and Christian charity. Distributive justice commands the State to allot benefits according to needs and burdens according to capacities. In the present situation this formula requires our Federal state to provide the destitute unemployed with at least the weekly amount that I have just mentioned and to collect the necessary taxes from those persons who are best able to pay. By enforcing this program, the Federal Government will also fulfill the grave obligation of charity which requires that superfluous goods be devoted to the relief of all grave needs.

Under the head of economic aspects of the crisis, I shall consider briefly the proposed Federal tax legislation and the efforts of the Federal Government to lessen unemployment and initiate a revival of business. Both as an economist and as a moralist, I regard the policy of balancing the Budget at this time as unnecessary and unjustifiable. During the great war we did not think it necessary to balance the Budget, although the annual deficit was much greater than it is at present and the productive resources of the country considerably smaller. Since, however, Congress has committed itself to that mistaken course, the only questions for consideration are those of economy and taxation. No economies in the operation of the Federal Government and its divisions should be adopted which would cause the discontinuance of any useful service to the people or the reduction of the wages or salaries of Federal employees. Such measures would make the industrial depression worse, by destroying purchasing power and thereby diminishing business. Concerning taxation, the main issues revolve about the sales tax and high income taxes.

In this field we have one clear-cut Catholic principle which has been expounded without variation for centuries by the moral theologians. It is that taxes should be imposed according to ability to pay. Incidentally, this is the canon of taxation that is generally received among the economists. Now the only accurate and the only completely just measure of ability to pay is found in a person's annual income. That measures the amount that he has available in any given year for paying taxes in that year. The moral theologians are also unanimous in declaring that the rates in an income tax should be progressive, not uniform, in order to bring about something like equality of sacrifice among the different economic classes.

The principle of ability to pay is completely set aside and grossly violated in a general sales tax. In fact, such a tax inverts the principle of ability to pay, since it imposes the heaviest burdens on those who have the lowest incomes. A sales tax upon the necessaries and the elementary comforts of life subtracts from every dollar of the poor man's income because all of his income is expended for these commodities. Only a very small portion of the rich man's income is thus disbursed. Consequently, the only just sales tax is one which is restricted to a few costly luxuries which are purchased by the comfortable and well-to-do classes. While the sales tax which was defeated in the House of Representatives exempted food and clothing, it still covered a sufficient number of necessaries to impose, according to some of its advocates, a burden of $8 upon the man receiving only $1,000 of annual income. That would mean between twenty and twenty-five dollars upon an income of $2,400. This is ethically indefensible. The minimum that is necessary for decent existence should be exempt from all taxation. This ethical truth is recognized in all our income tax laws. The Federal law has never taxed incomes of less than $2,500 in the case of married men, nor incomes of less than $1,000 in the case of single men.

During the consideration by the Senate of the income-tax provisions of the bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee an amendment was introduced which would have substituted for the committee surtaxes those of the 1918 law applying to incomes of $10,000 and over. While these rates were the highest that were ever placed in a Federal law, they were considerably below the levels that would be demanded by complete justice. For example, the entire amount in surtaxes and normal taxes levied upon certain specified incomes were as follows: $830 on $10,000, $4,930 on $30,000, $11,030 on $50,000, $35,030 on $100,000. The persons who think these levies exorbitant or unreasonable should reflect that the amounts which men are obliged to pay on the corresponding incomes in the existing British law are from 35 to 125 per cent higher. Nevertheless, the Senate rejected these relatively moderate rates by a large majority. Those who voted against these rates were no doubt well aware that the increased revenue which they refused to collect from large incomes would have to be derived from a sales tax or from the nuisance taxes proposed in the Finance Committee bill, such as those upon movie tickets costing more than 10 cents, telegrams, checks, and 3-cent letter postage. In other words, the majority of the Senate rejected the principle of ability to pay in favor of the opposite principle.

The second economic aspect of the crisis which we have to consider is methods of reducing unemployment and reviving business. Up to last December the Federal Government had done nothing or practically nothing under either of these heads. The measures enacted by Congress at the present session to facilitate and expand credit have been successful in so far as any realistic person could have expected them to succeed. That is to say, they have prevented many bank failures and many business bankruptcies and somewhat diminished public trepidation. Being purely negative, they could not and did not bring about any positive improvement.

The average level of business and employment is considerably lower now than when these credit measures were enacted. The national administration fondly and fatuously expected that they would create sufficient confidence in business circles to initiate a marked and continuous revival. A few weeks ago the Secretary of the Treasury referred to credit and confidence as "the two magicians" that would put an end to the depression. His use of this phrase exposed the capital sin of the national administration. It has relied upon the magic of "psychology" rather than upon realistic economics. And it has been widely imitated by men who ought to know better. "In the United States," says Mr. Keynes, "it is almost inconceivable what rubbish a public man has to utter to-day if he is to keep respectable."

This attitude is a part of our evil heritage of economic theory and business theory. For more than a hundred years we have assumed that if only we can keep goods produced in abundance they will somehow find purchasers; and that if the economic machine ceases to function the fault must lie in the mechanism of credit. Hence the preoccupation of business men and the national administration with credit machinery. Hence the President's emphasis upon "confidence."

All this is putting the cart before the horse. What business needs to-day is not more credit nor more confidence, but more business. Neither business men nor bankers deserve severe blame for their failure to increase the amount of commercial and industrial operations. They can not be expected to do this until they see a definite prospect of increased sales of goods. The reason that no such prospect appears is to be found in the decline of purchasing power. The money available for buying goods is now only little more than half as great as it was in the year 1929. Purchasing power began to decline in that year because the wage earners and the farmers had not been receiving a sufficient amount of the national product. Too much was distributed to the well-to-do and the rich classes, who refused to spend more for the products of our factories and farms because they had already bought all that they needed.

The unequal and inequitable distribution of the national product at length resulted in the condition that those who would like to spend more for consumption goods had not the money, while those who had the money had not the desire. These elementary facts indicate the main cause of the depression, of its increase, and of its prolongation. Defects in the credit structure have indeed intensified the slump, but they are themselves effects of the bad distribution of income and purchasing power. It should be obvious that no juggling with an effect can remove the cause.

Here again Catholic principles are pertinent and would have prevented the depression. In his Encyclical, Quadragesimo Anno, Pope Pius XI declared that in order to be just the distribution of income should provide the working class with "ample sufficiency." If American workingmen had received "ample sufficiency," as the Pope describes it, in the years 1922–1929, they would have obtained at least 50 per cent more wages. Undoubtedly they would have expended a great proportion of the increase for primary goods, consumption goods, the products of the factories and farms. Such a vast expansion of purchasing would have kept all our industries going and made the existing industrial depression impossible. To be sure, capital would probably have received smaller returns, but there is nothing in the nature of man nor in the nature of industry nor in the moral law which dictates that capital should get even 6 per cent. According to the Holy Father, capital is entitled only to that return which is consistent with the common good and social justice. If we ever emerge from the depression, we shall have to take steps to decrease the share of capital and increase that of labor. Otherwise consumption will again quickly fall below production. Unemployment will again increase and all the conditions will be at hand for another depression.

Now that the failure of the credit measures to produce a business revival has become so evident that it can not be denied by the slowest witted among us, many business men, politicians, and statesmen realize that the only effective remedy is the creation of purchasing power through the expenditure of public money for public works. Some of us saw this at least 18 months ago and we told the aforesaid business men and politicians and statesmen all about it, but ours were voices crying in a wilderness of bad economic theory, stupid business maxims, political propaganda and ballyhoo, manufactured optimism, indisposition to look facts in the face and superstitious reliance upon psychology, shibboleths, slogans, and the formula brought to us from France a few years ago by the now almost forgotten Professor Coué. Some of you can recall that faker's magic phrase. It has long since been discredited and discarded. But the catchword, "confidence," is still urged upon us. In the name of common sense and common honesty, confidence in what? Since October, 1929, the average of business activity has fallen 47 per cent; employment 40 per cent, and purchasing power 47 per cent. The decline in all these factors has been continuous since last June and there is not a single economic fact to indicate that we have reached the bottom.

Within the last few days programs of public works have been brought forward by the Democratic leadership in the Senate, by the President of the United States, and by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. All these are vitally defective in one respect: they are not sufficiently comprehensive. In order to give adequate momentum to an improvement in business and to provide employment within a reasonable time for a reasonable proportion of those now out of work, we need much more than one and a half or two billion dollars. The $5,500,000,000 proposed by Senator LA FOLLETTE would not be excessive in the present critical situation. Unless the public expenditure reaches this magnitude, I fear that the words of John Maynard Keynes will be applicable to our own beloved country. In the article already cited, he says:

"Through lack of foresight and constructive imagination the financial and political authorities of the world have lacked the courage or the conviction at each stage of the decline to apply the available remedies in sufficiently drastic doses, and by now they have allowed the collapse to reach a point where the whole system may have lost its resiliency and its capacity for a rebound."

The President's plan exhibits an additional defect, inasmuch as it would confine public works to those which are "productive," those which would bring in revenue, such as toll bridges and tunnels. This idea is another evil heritage. It comes down from the Puritan conception of work as a spiritual good and an end in itself, not merely a means to fuller and more rational life. It is the legitimate descendant of the Puritan theory that production and efficiency are the goal of the Christian's efforts. Speaking of the Puritan conception of work and production as it operated in England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, R. H. Tawney declares that it supplanted the earlier doctrine that the end of economic life was consumption. (He is referring, of course, to the economic philosophy which prevailed in the Catholic Middle Ages.)

To apply to public works the test of "productiveness," "self-liquidation," and pecuniary profit, not only inverts the true order of values but ignores the very important economic fact that 80 per cent of our productive equipment could turn out all the material goods needed by the American people. Why should not the other 20 per cent be devoted to the production of public goods, of goods that might be enjoyed by all the people in common? They are not "unproductive." They produce human welfare, and that is the true end of all material production. They are not "of very remote usefulness"; they would be beneficial to the people from the moment of their completion. They would not produce pecuniary profits, but they would increase life, and, as John Ruskin said: "There is no wealth but life." Public highways, flood control, reforestation, the destruction of city slums, and many other so-called "nonproductive" works are capable of providing the community with the means of security, enjoyment, and decent living in far greater measure than additional supplies of factory products.

Most of the objections to an adequate program of public works are motivated by the ugly thing called greed, which, as the Holy Father has told us in his latest encyclical, is the main root of all the world's troubles to-day. The men who have large incomes are so greedy that they are unwilling to contemplate an increase in their taxes to provide interest on the bonds that would have to be sold to finance an adequate program of public works. The men who own existing issues of United States bonds are too greedy to put up with the decline which would take place in the value of their present holdings if the new bonds carried a higher rate of interest. Since greed is usually stupid and short-sighted, it prevents these men from perceiving that if an adequate program of public works were followed by a considerable revival of business they would gain far more from this improvement than they would lose through the payment of higher taxes or a decline in the value of their Government bonds. In 1928 an increase of 2 per cent in the rates of taxes on incomes above $10,000 would have yielded $250,000,000 of additional revenue. The possessors of such incomes will soon be called upon to pay many times 2 per cent more than they are now paying, even though we should have no public works and no revival of business. If the public works here advocated should fail to bring about a considerable upturn in business, the men who now receive large incomes would probably be in no worse position than that in which they are certain to find themselves a year from now if this program is not put into effect.

There is an objection to the public-works proposal which is not based upon greed. It asserts that five or six billion dollars' worth of bonds could not be sold. Perhaps not. But the only way to decide the question is to make the attempt. A few weeks ago an issue of more than half a billion United States Treasury notes, a part of which paid only 2 per cent interest, was oversubscribed ten times. There is still plenty of money in the country for such a program. If it is not put into operation this summer, there will be considerably less money when Congress reassembles next December. If the money can not be got through the sale of bonds, it could be produced by the Government printing presses. While this recourse would be attended with considerable danger, it would be a far less evil than another winter of unemployment complicated by revolution.

If an adequate public-works program can not be financed by either an issue of bonds or of paper money, there is nothing left but Government operation and control of such basic industries as are necessary to provide the destitute millions with the means of decent human existence. To shrink from this last alternative is to confess intellectual and economic bankruptcy. We can not permit millions to starve in this land of plenty, nor can we afford to unleash the forces of savagery and revolution. In the extreme predicament that is closer to us than we like to contemplate there is another Catholic principle which is pertinent and adequate. It was stated by Pope Leo XIII, in his encyclical on the Condition of Labor: "Whenever the general interest or any particular class suffers or is threatened with injury which in no other way can be met or prevented, it is the duty of public authority to intervene." If for any reason the public-works remedy fails, the public authorities will be under moral obligation to take temporary charge of and operate our essential industries, not only for the benefit of our most distressed classes but in the interest of the whole community.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SHIPSTEAD, which was, on page 244, after line 9, to insert:

(9) Copra, including products of copra of the Philippine Islands, hempseed, palm nuts, kapok seed, palm-nut kernels, tung nuts, rapeseed, perilla seed, sesame seed, rubber seed, 1 cent per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

(10) Coconut oil, the product of the Philippine Islands and other countries, palm oil, perilla and sweet almond oil, tung oil, herring oil, pilchard oil, whale oil, seal oil, sperm oil, crude, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

(11) Palm-kernel oil, sunflower oil, sesame oil, rapeseed oil, olive oil, all the foregoing if in inedible form, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to address myself for a few moments to the amendment offered to the pending bill by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] affecting fish oil and vegetable oil.

I think I might say that perhaps no Member of this body tries to follow as carefully as I do the recommendations of the committees of the Senate. If I can conscientiously do that, I endeavor to do it. I think that ought to be particularly true with respect to a tax bill, where very many persons who are taxed are complaining of the tax; and those of us who are not on the committee realize the burdens resting upon the committee in endeavoring to find by taxation the necessary money to meet the deficit that exists and is likely to exist.

I have the same feeling with respect to this bill. I had it when I voted upon the four items that are commonly called tariff items in this bill. I think it is wholly unimportant at this time to discuss who is responsible for what are called tariff items being in this particular bill.

It is well known to all of us that when the bill came to the Senate it had two of those items in it, and it is also well known that the Finance Committee added two other items to the bill. We all know that in support of the measure and in support of the taxes on these particular items the two sides of this Chamber were equally divided, or practically so. Therefore, I am not concerned about placing the responsibility. I care not whether it belongs on this side or whether it belongs on the other side. From the very beginning I believed it was a mistake to place tariff items in the bill. I believed it was a mistake because, having once opened the door to what are called tariff items, it would be so very difficult to close that door.

The question I am faced with now is whether we shall let the committee close the door or whether I shall be justified in presenting to the Senate the claims of persons who are very much interested in this particular amendment.

I do not think it is worth while to discuss whether these tariff measures were placed in the bill for the sole purpose of raising revenue or whether they were placed there for the purpose of protecting the various industries. I think it may very well be admitted that for the most part they were put there for the purpose of protecting the industries. The people in my State and in other States who have appealed to me with respect to this particular item certainly are more interested in protection than they are in raising revenue.

It is, however, a fact that if this amendment is adopted it will go a long way toward increasing the revenue which is necessary to be raised by the bill that is now before the Senate.

When the people interested in this subject appeal to me it is not possible for me to say to them that the item was not included in the committee's recommendation, and therefore they can have no vote upon it in the Senate. I have hesitated, and I hesitate now, to urge it upon the Senate.

On the other hand, I find that on next to the last vote last night both sides of this aisle did not hesitate at all to turn aside from the recommendations of the committee, and to vote out an increase in the taxes upon automobile trucks and accessories.

I do not think the criticism of the President by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is justified. He complains that the President of the United States, if he wants this bill passed and wants the Budget balanced, should have seen to it that the tariff items were taken from the bill. He complains because the President sits in his chair at the White House and keeps silent with respect to the matter, when the Senator urges that a single word from the President would have kept out these items entirely and would have hastened the passage of the bill.

It is undoubtedly true that if the President had made a recommendation to Congress, if he had sent here a message urging that those things be kept out, he would have been criticized very much more severely for sending such a message and undertaking to interfere with the Congress than for saying nothing, as he did in this particular instance. So I pass that by as unworthy of any particular comment or any particular answer. We are discussing now this particular amendment and I want to call to the attention of the Senate just what it means.

If the amendment is adopted as presented by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], it will mean, from last year's figures, the approximate sum of $25,000,000 in revenue to this Government. I frankly admit, however, that that is not the purpose I have. I have in mind the distressed condition of the fish-oil industry in this country of ours; and I call attention to the fact that it is not only my State that is affected. Many States in this Union are affected. All of the coastal States on both sides are affected.

The State of Maine has a number of plants, covering more than a page. There are plants in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Washington, Oregon, California, and Alaska. Every State that I have mentioned has more than one plant. Some of them have as many as 50 plants. The State of Maine, I think, has as many as 50 plants; and my understanding is that there has been invested in this industry a sum amounting to approximately $150,000,000.

I do not know, and the people who have talked with me on the subject say they do not know, of a single one of these plants that has been able to operate at all for the past two years, because of the oils that are being sent into this country from foreign countries, without the payment of any tax of any kind. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that some 1,500,000,000 pounds of various oils are sent into this country without the payment of any tax whatever.

As I have stated, the total tax—and it is a small rate, of 2 cents a pound—would, it is estimated, bring into the Federal Treasury some $25,000,000.

The industries to which I have referred employ some 35,000 men in the 300 plants, and for two years they have not been able to manufacture and sell their product at a profit at all because of the influx of the oil from all the countries of the world.

This condition affects not only the particular industry to which I am drawing attention, but the imposition of this tax is the same thing the farmers of this country have been asking the Congress to do for many years. In the consideration of every tariff bill that has been passed an effort has been made by the farmers of the country to have inserted in the measure a sufficient tax to protect the farmers who are constantly producing this oil. What has been the answer? It has been that if we put a tax upon this oil, we will increase the price of soap, in the manufacture of which this kind of oil is used. If Senators will look at the financial sheets of the large soap manufacturers of this country, who have done so much to prevent the imposition of a tariff duty being placed upon that product, they will find that they have not suffered as other industries of the country have suffered. It will be found, in addition to that, that the argument that has been made, that it was a crime to put a tax upon this article, and thereby put a tax upon the poor people who use for bath purposes the soap manufactured from these oils, is like the argument used by the manufacturers of bread. While the article they use in the manufacture of soap has decreased in price, not a dime has been taken off the cakes of soap they sell to the public. People are paying just as much for soap as they ever paid, and if this amendment shall be agreed to, they will not pay one cent more per 100 pounds than they are paying now.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that in the years 1912 to 1914 the soap manufacturers used 80 per cent of domestic oils. From 1919 to 1921 they used 68 per cent. From 1928 to 1930 they used 57 per cent and 43 per cent of foreign oil. So it can be seen that there is no chance for the persons manufacturing this oil, either from fish or in any of the various ways it is manufactured from foreign importations.

There is one difficulty in connection with the pending amendment which has been referred to by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. That is with respect to the Philippine Islands. The amount of these oils sent from the Philippine Islands to the United States is very large. Something like $11,000,000 would be the tax on the oils coming from those islands, so that if the Philippines shall be excluded, as the Senator from Missouri proposes, it would cut down the amount of revenue received from the tax on these oils to approximately $14,000,000 instead of $25,000,000. In pounds the amount sent here is 783,000,000, out of a total of 1,500,000,000 pounds.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care to get into a discussion as to whether or not it is necessary to exclude from the effect of this amendment the Philippine Islands. I assume it is, because the Senate has time and time again refused to put upon sugar produced in those islands the tariff necessary to protect the sugar industries of this country, and I am assuming, therefore, that it may be the sense of the Senate that the amendment which the Senator from Missouri I understand is about to offer, namely, to exclude the Philippine Islands from the operation of this amendment, may be adopted by the Senate. But even if that amendment shall be adopted I respectfully submit there is enough merit left in the Shipstead amendment, as there will be enough help to be afforded by it to do some good to the farmers and to revive this fishing industry. Therefore I hope the Senate may see its way clear to adopt the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HOWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me to offer an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HAWES. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the amendment be reported, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, after line 9, the Senator from Missouri proposes to insert:

(9) Copra, hempseed, palm nuts, kapok seed, palm-nut kernels, tung nuts, rapeseed, perilla seed, sesame seed, rubber seed, 1 cent per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles, but notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (5) of subsection (b) of this section, shall not apply to importations from the Philippine Islands or other possessions of the United States.

(10) Coconut oil, palm oil, perilla and sweet almond oil, tung oil, herring oil, pilchard oil, whale oil, seal oil, sperm oil, crude, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles, but notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (5) of subsection (b) of this section, shall not apply to importations from the Philippine Islands or other possessions of the United States.

(11) Palm-kernel oil, sunflower oil, sesame oil, rapeseed oil, olive oil, all the foregoing if in inedible form, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles, but notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (5) of subsection (b) of this section, shall not apply to importations from the Philippine Islands or other possessions of the United States.

PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the determination on the part of Congress to introduce tariff items in this revenue bill is evident. The House of Representatives has already approved tariff duties on petroleum, gasoline, lubricating oil, and coal. The Senate Finance Committee revised the list by accepting tariff duties on all these products, with some modifications, in addition adding tariffs on all other liquid-petroleum products; paraffin; asphalt; lumber, rough, planed, or dressed; copper; and rubber tires and tubes. The Senate thus far has approved duties on petroleum and petroleum products, gasoline, lubricating oil, lumber, copper, paraffin, asphalt, and coal.

All of these duties impose additional burdens upon the consumers, and especially upon agriculture. The farmers are large users of petroleum, gasoline, lubricating oil, rubber tires and other rubber products, and lumber of all kinds and will have to pay more for these products because these tariff duties will be passed on to the consumers, the largest group being composed of farmers.

Congress is inserting tariff duties in this revenue bill not primarily to obtain revenue, except in the case of tires and tubes, but to aid the oil industry, to aid the lumber industry, to aid the copper-mining industry, the asphalt industry. But what has it proposed to do for the farmers? If we are to put additional burdens on the farmers of this country to aid these industries, then agriculture—now lowest on the economic scale—must receive some aid.

The purpose of the amendment under consideration is twofold: First, to produce revenue; and, second, to remedy to some extent agriculture's inequality in tariff benefits.

It is estimated that this amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] would yield a total revenue of approximately $25,000,000 annually.

This tax will be more equitably distributed than the tariff duties already imposed, which will hit special groups particularly hard. The taxes on vegetable and animal oils, if paid by the great, affluent soap companies and other industrial users of these oils, will be less burdensome than the duties paid by farmers and laboring people. Even if passed on to the consumers of these industrial products, the costs will be distributed over such a wide range of products and the percentage of increased cost will be so small and will be distributed among such a large number of taxpayers, that this indirect tax will not be burdensome.

On the other hand the benefits of this proposed amendment will be diffused among millions of farmers and among thousands of workmen in oil mills which can resume operation in competition with mills using imported oils, whereas the tariffs on oils, copper, coal, and lumber will benefit mainly a comparatively small number of oil corporations, coal barons, mining companies, and lumber companies, together with the limited number of employees in these specialized industries.

Agriculture is not protected, in fact, as is industry protected under existing tariff rates. Congress ignored many of the recommendations of agriculture when it enacted the tariff act of 1930. One of the most important omissions was the failure to protect agriculture from the enormous flood of tropical oils and fats which enter our markets duty free and displace the use of American butter and American lard and American vegetable and animal oils which otherwise might be used for similar uses in place of the imported oils.

The pending amendment proposes to remedy this injustice and to levy moderate excise taxes on the imports of certain oils and fats which for the most part enter our markets free of duty. With the exception of fish and whale oils, which now carry very low rates of duty, all of the oils and fats and all of the oil-bearing materials in the pending amendment enter our markets free of duty.

The proposed amendment would place a tax of 1 cent on the following oil-bearing seeds and nuts which now enter free of duty: Copra, hempseed, palm nuts, kapok seed, palmnut kernels, tung nuts, rapeseed, perilla seed, sesame seed, and rubber seed.

A duty of 2 cents per pound would be placed on the following oils and fats: Coconut oil, product of the Philippine Islands; palm oil; perilla and sweet almond oil; tung oil; herring oil; pilchard oil; whale oil; seal oil; sperm oil, crude; and upon the following oils in inedible form: Palmkernel oil, sunflower oil, sesame oil, rapeseed oil, and olive oil.

We now import nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds of oils and fats, including oil from imported materials. In 1923 our exports practically equaled our imports, whereas in 1930 our exports had sharply declined and our imports had sharply increased, with the result that the imports exceeded exports by 932,905,000 pounds, or nearly 1,000,000,000 pounds. This is shown in a table appearing in the 1932 report of the Tariff Commission on certain vegetable oils.

I now ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in the RECORD the table referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, what does this mean to agriculture? It means that domestic oils produced from the products of American farms have been displaced to a large extent by the use of cheaper imported materials.

Since 1914 the use of domestic oils and fats in food has increased 31.1 per cent, while the use of foreign oils in food has increased 2,169 per cent. The use of domestic oils for soap making has increased about 41 per cent, while the use of foreign oils for soap making has increased 389 per cent. The total consumption of the principal domestic oils and fats for all uses has increased about 27 per cent, while the use of the principal foreign oils and fats for all uses has increased 2,862 per cent. These figures are shown in a table from the report of the Tariff Commission, 1932, which I request permission to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the dairy farmers have suffered from increased competition and displacement of butter by the enormous increase in production of margarine. A table—Table III—taken from the 1932 report of the Tariff Commission shows the enormous increase in the output of this industry in the United States, the total production increasing from 144,000,000 pounds in 1914 to 312,000,000 pounds in 1930, or about two and one-half times the production in 1914. Every pound of margarine displaces a pound of butter which otherwise might be utilized.

I desire to insert at this point in the RECORD another table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Report of Tariff Commission on certain vegetable oils, 1932.

Mr. HOWELL. Production of lard substitutes has increased from 876,927,000 pounds in 1912 to 1,211,268,000 pounds in 1930, which is an increase of almost 50 per cent. At this point I ask consent to insert an additional table in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

1912	876,927
1914	1,136,522
1919	1,350,000

Calendar year	Production	Consumption
1921	811,095
1923	750,522	747,899
1925	1,152,620	1,135,215
1927	1,178,995	1,166,413
1929	1,220,102	1,214,986
1930	1,211,268

Mr. HOWELL. Every pound of lard substitute displaces a pound of lard, which otherwise might be used. The production of lard substitutes in 1929, totaling 1,220,102,000 pounds, exceeded our total exports of lard amounting to 829,328,000 pounds by approximately 400,000,000 pounds, or 50 per cent more than our exports of lard. In other words, if it were not for the competition of lard substitutes we would have a deficit of 400,000,000 pounds of lard instead of an exportable surplus of 800,000,000 pounds. Visualize what this would mean in increased price to the hog producers of the country who are now forced to take the world price for their lard, whereas if they were on a deficit basis the tariff of 3 cents per pound on lard would tend to become fully effective.

If it were not for the unprofitableness of the use of cottonseed oil and other vegetable oils in other industrial products by reason of the competition from imported oils, large quantities of these domestic vegetable oils could be used in those industries instead of using such large quantities in production of butter and lard substitutes to compete with butter and lard.

In the soap industry there has been a large replacement of domestic oils by foreign oils. In 1914 domestic oils constituted 79 per cent of all the oils consumed in soap in the United States, whereas in 1929 domestic oils constituted only 51 per cent of all the oils used in soap, due to the increased utilization of imported oils.

The use of imported coconut oil increased from 9.5 per cent of the total consumption of oil for soap in 1914 to 19.4 per cent in 1930. The use of imported palm oil increased from 1.2 per cent to 12.3 per cent. The use of imported whale oil increased from one-half of 1 per cent in 1914 to 3.3 per cent in 1930. The use of imported herring and sardine oil increased from virtually nothing in 1914 to 1.4 per cent in 1930.

In striking contrast with the increased utilization of imported oils for soap, the use of domestic cottonseed oil decreased from 14.6 per cent of the total oil consumption in soap in 1914 to one-half of 1 per cent in 1930; domestic cottonseed foots from 13.2 per cent to 6.6 per cent; domestic tallow from 31.5 per cent to 27.8 per cent.

This is shown in tables from the 1932 report of the Tariff Commission, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Report of the Tariff Commission on certain vegetable oils, 1932.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, here is an opportunity to do something for the farmer. Here is an opportunity to insert in the tax bill an amendment which is wholly germane because it provides for the raising of revenue. If the amendment should be adopted, it would mean an additional $25,000,000 of revenue raised annually. Therefore, as I said, the amendment is germane, whereas the other tariff amendments were not germane because they are not for the purpose of raising revenue and will raise but little revenue. Their purpose is to aid the industries affected, whereas we want to aid the agricultural industry. Yet, Mr. President, this is an appreciable increase of revenue under the tax bill, and it is for that reason I say it is germane. It is now proposed that we eliminate importations from the Philippine Islands. If that is done, vast amounts of coconut oil will come in free in competition with the American products of this character. We certainly ought to give some consideration to agriculture. Here is an opportunity, and we should not split hairs.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued!

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, when the tariff act of 1930 was under consideration in the Senate I sought duties which, in my judgment, would have guarded our farmers from the disastrous competition of tremendous importations of vegetable, animal, and marine oils and fats. The farmers, through their organizations, pleaded with Congress for such duties. Adequate tariff treatment, however, was not accorded by Congress.

During 1929 the imports of duty-free oils and fats, including raw material in terms of oil, totaled over one and one-quarter billion pounds. The tariff act of 1930 gave the farmers but little substantial protection against this volume of free imports. As a result, during 1930 a total of 1,302,702,000 pounds was imported duty free into the United States, or a somewhat larger amount than in 1929.

Will anyone say that agriculture is sufficiently protected against the competition of tropical oils and fats when a total of 1,302,702,000 pounds are imported free of duty, compared to 511,005,000 pounds dutiable? Many of the oils and fats in the dutiable list carry duties wholly inadequate to allow domestic oils and fats to compete successfully with them in our own markets.

I offer for the RECORD a table which I have marked "Table No. 1" showing the increase in duty-free imports of oils and fats during the past few years. I ask that all the tables to be inserted at my request may be printed in the order mentioned at the conclusion of my address.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Table No. 1.)

Mr. SHEPPARD. The proposed amendment places an excise tax primarily for revenue purposes upon all of the oils and fats which now enter free of duty, and all of the oil-bearing seeds and nuts which now enter free of duty. All of the materials taxed under this amendment enter free of duty except fish oil and whale oil, which are dutiable under the tariff act of 1930 at 5 cents per gallon and 6 cents per gallon, respectively, or approximately two-thirds of 1 cent per pound, and four-fifths of 1 cent per pound, respectively.

These taxes would not only bring in a substantial amount of revenue but would help our farmers to compete with imported products in their own markets.

Permit me to indicate how some of our farmers have been injured by the increased utilization of these foreign oils and fats at the expense of domestic oils and fats. In 1914 cottonseed oil, for example, constituted 63 per cent of the total consumption of all domestic oils, except lard, butter, and edible olive oil, but in 1929 cottonseed oil constituted only 36.6 per cent of the total domestic consumption of these oils. Cottonseed foots constituted 4.6 per cent of the total consumption of these oils in 1914, and only 2.7 per cent in 1929, whereas during the same period the use of imported coconut and palm-kernel oil increased from 4.9 per cent of the total consumption to 18.6 per cent, the use of imported palm oil from 2.1 per cent to 5.7 per cent, the use of imported whale oil from two-tenths of 1 per cent to 1½ per cent.

I ask to insert in the RECORD a table which I have marked "Table No. II," showing these comparative figures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Table No. II.)

Mr. SHEPPARD. Note what has happened in the margarine industry. In 1914 crude coconut oil was selling at 12.2 cents per pound on the Pacific coast, and cottonseed oil at 6.6 cents per pound at New York, coconut oil representing only three-tenths of 1 per cent of the total oil consumption in margarine, cottonseed oil representing 20 per cent. In 1931 coconut oil was selling for 4.5 cents per pound, cottonseed oil for 7.2 cents per pound, coconut oil supplying 66.8 per cent of the total oil consumption in margarine, while cottonseed oil supplied but 9.4 per cent. This shows the extent of the displacement of domestic cottonseed oil by imported coconut oil in the manufacture of margarine.

In this connection I wish to insert in the RECORD another table which I have marked "Table No. III."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Table No. III.)

Mr. SHEPPARD. This table shows that the rapid displacement of domestic cottonseed oil by imported coconut oil has been closely accompanied by the reduction of price in coconut oil to such extent that the latter has undersold domestic cottonseed oil in our own markets.

In the soap industry, the proportion of cottonseed oil has greatly declined while that of imported oils has greatly increased during the period from 1914 to 1931. In 1914, coconut oil was selling at 12.2 cents per pound, and cottonseed oil at 6.6 cents per pound, cottonseed oil representing 14.6 per cent of the total domestic consumption of oils in soap, whereas coconut and palm-kernel oils represented 13.4 per cent. In 1930, when coconut oil was selling for 5.9 cents per pound and cottonseed oil for 8.1 cents per pound, cottonseed oil amounted to only one-half of 1 per cent of the domestic consumption of oils in soap making, whereas coconut and palm-kernel oils, both of them articles of foreign production, represented 21.3 per cent.

With the permission of the Senate, Mr. President, I desire to insert another table which I have marked "Table IV." It shows a close connection between the comparative prices of domestic cottonseed oil and imported coconut oil, with the relative use of these oils in soap making during the period from 1914 to 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Table No. IV.)

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, while there are particular types of soap to which coconut oil and palm-kernel oil are better suited than domestic oils by themselves, this can not be said by any means of all soaps, and only applies to a few types of soap. Moreover, the Tariff Commission reports that even for the types of soap in which coconut oil and palm-kernel oil are used extensively, the amount of coconut oil and palm-kernel oil can be increased or decreased considerably without changing appreciably the character of the soap.

The Tariff Commission further reports that soap manufacturers some years ago deliberately inaugurated an advertising campaign to promote the use of white soap as against yellow soap, and by means of these advertising campaigns helped to create a feeling in favor of white soaps, although colored soaps are just as efficient in their cleansing properties. In the manufacture of white soaps, coconut oil and palm-kernel oil are extensively used. In the manufacture of yellow soaps, cottonseed oil, foots, inedible tallow, domestic rosin, and other domestic materials are used.

I desire to refer to another table, being Table V, Mr. President, which I should like to insert in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Table V.)

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, Table V shows that approximately 272,987,000 pounds of rosin might have been used in 1929 for the manufacture of soap if the use of rosin had increased to the same extent as the use of soap oils increased. Imported oils and fats are also used extensively in colored soaps. The soap manufacturers not only have displaced domestic oils in the manufacture of colored soaps to a large extent, but they have further displaced domestic oils by promoting through high-pressure sales methods and advertising campaigns the use of white soaps, in which large amounts of imported coconut oil and palm-kernel oil are used.

The soap interests have placed an exaggerated emphasis upon the alleged value of certain imported oils for soap uses. Even if imported oils were better ingredients than domestic oils for all types of soap, we would still be confronted with the displacement of domestic oils and fats in the manufacture of margarine and lard substitutes, as well as the displacement of domestic butter, as was pointed out by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] yesterday. There can be no question but that cottonseed oil, tallow, and other domestic materials are just as good as the imported oils and fats in making margarine and lard compounds. There can be no question as to the displacement of domestic butter in substantial and growing degree by the importation of foreign oils and fats for margarine manufacture.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is also a fact that soap manufacturers are charging as much for soap now with the raw materials at 3½ cents a pound as they charged when the raw materials were 17 cents a pound.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I welcome that statement from the Senator.

The proposed amendment will not end the importation of foreign oils and fats. The soap manufacturers can still secure the oils and fats which they consider suitable to their particular formulas. The difference will be that these foreign oils and fats now entering our markets free of duty will have to pay a very modest contribution to the support of our Government instead of using our markets and paying nothing to the Government for the privilege. At the same time, the passage of the amendment will stimulate the use of domestic products with undoubted benefit to American agriculture.

Mr. President, the most important fact in connection with any industry is the condition of the workers engaged in its operation. Far above inanimate commodities, such as lumber, coal, copper, and oil, in true value and significance are the men, the women, and the children dependent on the production of such commodities for their livelihood. The masses of the American people find sustenance and occupation almost wholly as hand toilers in the various industries of the United States. Probably not more than 15 per cent of the American people may be found outside the ranks of manual toilers. These hand workers are the principal pillars of our civilization. It is vital to them and to the country that the industries affording them subsistence and employment be preserved.

The disappearance or the impairment of one industry with the purchasing power it establishes to sustain markets for the production of other industries would weaken our entire economic structure. Strike down the earning and producing power and therefore the purchasing power of the working masses in oil, in copper, in coal, in lumber, in farming, and they will not only undergo unspeakable hardship and privation themselves but they will have nothing with which to buy the products of the remainder of the laboring multitudes. It is no remedy for the poverty and distress of the producing masses to permit floods of foreign articles, made by impoverished labor, continuously to pour into this country and break down the already inadequate prices the home workers are now receiving.

It has been said, Mr. President, during the course of this debate, that we should buy wherever we can buy cheapest, not only here but throughout the world. Everything produced in the United States can be produced somewhere on the globe outside our own limits at a lower price than is possible here. Suppose we buy everything abroad, thus causing domestic production to cease. When, in pursuing such a course, we exhaust existing funds, credits, and surpluses, how will the American people obtain further funds, credits, and commodities to exchange for the necessities of existence even at the low prices of low-standard foreign regions? With our producing power destroyed, where will we obtain the purchasing power to make possible the continuance of our existence and our civilization? Not only will there be nothing to exchange for foreign articles on which a policy of buying wherever we can buy the cheapest will have made us dependent but there will be nothing with which to support Government itself or the institutions and facilities essential to our civilization and our progress.

If the support of measures intended to relieve the stricken workers in coal and lumber and copper and oil while extending such support to measures for workers in all other lines wherever needed, including agriculture, makes one a member of an unholy combination, as some Senators so mistakenly have charged in the course of this debate, I welcome that designation as a badge of honor and a mark of merit.

The present Congress has been compelled to devote itself mainly to relief measures, due to the fact that the American masses are suffering from the severest economic distress they have as yet experienced, and many Senators are opposed to the relief measures which have been inserted in the pending bill on the theory that they are willing to save America but are unwilling to save it in the wrong bill. I am supporting all these measures in the hope that the working multitudes in every industry and occupation will have been reached by every aid at the command of government before this session of Congress ends. The tariff amendments proposed in connection with this bill comprise a part, as I see the situation, of a general relief program.

We have enacted immigration laws because we desire to protect the producing masses of America from the cheap labor of the world, and yet we are still admitting the products of that labor without any restrictions whatever, so far as many basic industries are concerned, to beat down the economic conditions and the purchasing power of the American workers engaged in such industries.

The Democratic House of Representatives has opened the way for aid to certain essential industries in the present bill by sending us a revenue measure with tariff rates on foreign articles competing with these industries which provide relief as well as revenue. It might be well to say here that almost every tariff bill in our history has combined revenue with its other objectives.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Addressing myself to the Senator from Texas, let me say that I did not have the benefit of listening to all his address, but I take it that his reasoning justifies adequate protection on, for example, long-staple cotton, almonds, citrus fruits, casein, and poultry and dairy products, all of which, unless adequately protected, will come into fatal competition with the like products shipped into this country from countries where cheap pauper labor prevails.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Wherever that condition applies undoubtedly there should be adequate relief. In my view, the proper theory of the tariff is to consider each article on its own merits and apply such tariff treatment as legitimate conditions demand. That, however, is an entirely different proposition from saying that one is in favor of exorbitant tariffs or corrupt tariffs, or anything bearing the name of tariff.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But they should be adequate to measure the differential between the cost of producing the article here and the cost of producing it in some cheap-labor country.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Houston platform laid down the rule and established the yardstick by which the Democratic Party is pledged to a tariff that will measure the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. I have endeavored throughout all the tariff discussions of 1929, 1930, and the present time to follow that rule. I have never violated it so far as I know.

The position I took at the outset in reference to this bill was that we ought not to involve tariff items with the revenue bill. It seemed apparent to me that if we launched upon that field, we would find ourselves in the difficulties which now confront us. It is not fair to put in the bill certain items which are entitled to be considered—meritorious items, deserving of our attention in every way—and then exclude others and say, "We will go so far and no farther. We will put in four tariff items. We will not put in five." That amounts to a discrimination against other products that are just as meritorious, but are necessarily involved in the tariff idea.

I think it would have been well if we had omitted all tariff items from this bill and had submitted to the House of Representatives, where that legislation must originate, the idea that they should bring in tariff bills affecting these items and any other items that had merit in them. Let them bring in what we had during the war—what we called "popgun" tariff bills—and consider bills respecting different items or different schedules. They need not undertake to revise the whole tariff law but they could submit bills covering items of particular emergency demands and claims.

That idea did not seem to appeal to them. At any rate no such bills have been introduced in the other body. They did submit this bill with coal and oil in it; and, notwithstanding opposition to considering in this bill any items of a tariff nature, they were reported here by the committee.

I voted against them because I had a strong impression that we ought not to have those items in this bill; but the Senate voted them in. So we are in the position of having in the law certain particular commodities that are dealt with under the tariff rules imposing duties upon imports respecting particular items; and when that has been done I do not feel that we ought to say that we will go thus far and no farther, and we will not undertake to adjust meritorious items and claims beyond the particular things that have been voted in the bill.

Consequently, when the lumber amendment came up, the Senate having already voted in coal and oil, lumber seemed to me just as thoroughly justified; and there being considerable interest in that industry in the yellow-pine region of my part of the country, I felt that it would be a discrimination against them to say, "Your claims shall not be considered."

So we undertook to add to that item a provision for phosphate. There is a great industry. Sixty-seven million dollars are invested in it. A large number of people are employed in it; and it is threatened by Government monopoly. An inexhaustible supply of phosphate is now available in Morocco. The Moroccan Government are operating the mines, transporting the product, establishing docks and terminals for handling it, and are able to bring it across the ocean practically as cheaply as we can transport our phosphate to the markets in the United States.

They have already practically taken away the markets of Europe from our exporters, and they are invading this market, and they will eventually take this market. We can not mine phosphate in this country and produce it and put it on the market and transport it to the market as cheaply as they can do it there, where they are paying Arab labor 25 cents a day to mine it. The Senate, however, said, "No; we will not have that"; and I felt somewhat chagrined at the idea, because I think it is as meritorious an item as can be offered here.

However, here comes another proposition. As I have stated, I believe all these tariff items should be omitted from the bill. If I get an opportunity later on to strike them all out of the bill, I will vote to do so. I do not think they ought to be in the bill; but we have put them in. The Senate has done it; the House has done it; and here is another proposition that I think has very great merit. I do not feel that I would be justified in voting against it, in view of what has already been done, merely because of my belief that the bill should not include tariff items.

I shall not undertake to comment further on the arguments that have been submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. They have gone especially into paragraphs (9) and (11) of the amendment. I shall confine the few remarks I make to paragraph (10), because I happen to know something about the menhaden-oil industry.

It is quite an important industry. The people engaged in it are being almost driven out of business by the competition of other oils that are being imported into this country. Profits have diminished, and they practically see the end of their venture unless something is provided that will enable them to compete on a proper basis with the foreign importations.

There were produced in the United States last year, of menhaden oils, 15,179,099 pounds; of herring oil, including sardine and pilchard, 46,224,048 pounds; of whale oil, 16,193 pounds; and of other oils, for 1930, 1,754,558 pounds.

The exportation of these marine-animal oils from the United States is negligible; but the imports of competing oils are increasing year after year, and now amount to enormous quantities.

Of herring oil, for instance, including sardine and pilchard, the imports in 1931 were 31,825,650 pounds; of whale oil, 81,196,875 pounds; of seal oil, 599,025 pounds; and of other oils, 1,636,433 pounds.

The salvation of the industry depends upon the provisions carried in this amendment, and I think they are entitled to them. I am not particular about eliminating the Philippines. I make no objection so far as that is concerned. I think that would really be in accordance with our past policy; but, for the reasons I have stated, and without enlarging upon them, I am inclined to support and shall support this amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I did not know until this morning, when my attention was called to it through reading the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], that in the Finance Committee we had permitted to remain in the bill section 601, paragraph (b) (5), which states that the taxes on imports imposed in this bill—shall be imposed in full, notwithstanding any provision of law granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States.

Of course, one is always in danger in trusting to one's memory. My own recollection of our discussion in the Finance Committee was that this paragraph, which formerly included also provisions of treaties with other countries, had been entirely stricken out. Apparently my recollection is at fault, for in the bill, as reported from the committee, while the words "or treaty" are stricken out of the provision, so that we do not change, and very properly so, the duties on products coming from Cuba, for instance, or any country to which we grant a reduction of duties, we have under this provision treated our possessions in a manner contrary to the policy which heretofore has been followed by the United States.

I think that is a correct statement of the case.

Our possessions include the Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, and several small groups of islands, like the Virgin Islands, Guam, and the Samoan Islands, that are not incorporated territories, as are the Hawaiian Islands, and as is the Territory of Alaska. My recollection is that with the possible exception of tobacco, on which a drawback is given to the Philippine government, we permit the products of our possessions to come in free of duty. That has been our policy for many years. During the discussion of the last tariff bill passed by the Congress the matter was fully threshed out, and by a very large vote the proposal to place a duty on Philippine products was voted down by the Congress. I see my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] about rising to his feet, and I shall ask him whether or not that is correct.

Mr. HAWES. That is correct. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question? All of the products of the United States, which are in rather large volume, are admitted to these possessions of ours without tax, are they not?

Mr. BINGHAM. Entirely free of duty.

Mr. HAWES. And the Philippine Islands are not permitted to levy such a tax.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. HAWES. Which practically excludes all foreign importations, and does not permit the Philippines to derive a revenue of any kind for their own government.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true also of the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico.

Mr. HAWES. So in this case we would put a tax on the products of the Philippines and prevent the Philippines from putting a tax upon the products of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. HAWES. And they have nothing to say about it. It is a matter controlled exclusively by our Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, at the proper time I shall move to strike out, on page 240, lines 21 to 24, which I thought the Finance Committee had stricken out in the committee. I shall move to strike that language out on the ground that it is contrary to the policy the United States has followed for many years past.

In regard to the pending amendment, the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], and the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri, let me say that it seems to me that to include two of the principal products of the Philippines, namely, coconut oil and copra, and to put copra on the tariff schedule when to-day it comes in free of duty, is entirely indefensible.

Copra is not produced in the United States. Copra is a product which we have always had on the free list. Copra from the Philippine Islands naturally comes in free of duty, as it comes in from other countries, and to put a duty on Philippine copra would be striking at one of the industries of a country which is now under our guardianship and striking at our wards in an entirely indefensible manner.

To double the duty on coconut oil, the present duty being 2 cents and the proposed addition of 2 cents bringing it up to 4 cents, might be defensible from the point of view of those who produce oils of one sort or other in the United States, but to place a tariff of 2 cents on oil coming from the Philippines would destroy the Philippine coconut-oil industry, an industry started largely with American capital. It is not a very large industry, but it is one of the things on which the Philippine government depends for part of its revenue. That provision would simply mean that the coconut-oil industry in the Philippines would be wiped out, and that the material would come in under the head of copra. Placing a tax on a material imported from one of our possessions, for whom we are responsible, whose laws we make and to whom we deny the privilege of placing a tax on any of our products, seems to me so indefensible that I trust the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, in so far as it concerns the Philippine Islands, will not prevail and that the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri will prevail.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything on the pending amendment, but it seems to me, since a large share of the argument offered in favor of it has been on the ground that it was going to help agriculture, my silence might be misconstrued when considered in connection with the vote I am going to cast.

I think the argument as to the benefits this amendment would mean to agriculture is very much exaggerated, although I am not going to discuss that proposition. If the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri shall be agreed to, I shall have no objection to the amendment and expect to vote for it.

My objection is based upon an entirely different principle. We are holding the people of the Philippine Islands without their consent. We are passing laws for their government. They are under our control and under our flag—not because they asked to come under it but because we took them under it by force.

We pass laws for their government. Our laws will not permit them to levy a tariff upon anything going from the United States into the Philippine Islands. This amendment proposes to levy a tariff on their products coming to the United States.

In my judgment that is absolutely indefensible, regardless of what the thing or the subject is upon which we are to levy the tariff. Our Government originally became a government because our forefathers said that taxation without representation was tyranny. It seems to me that if there is one thing more than another that is the very foundation corner stone and excuse for our existence of the Government it is that principle. It would be absolute tyranny, as I look at it, to say to any people, "We will take you without your consent, hold you in subjection; we will make laws for your government; you are a part of our country, under our laws; we will not permit you to pass any tariff act that will levy a tariff duty upon anything coming from our country into yours, but we will, without consulting you, and without your consent, levy a tariff tax upon the products of your country which come to ours."

The Philippines are not under our Government, as I said, because they want to be. They are clamoring, and have been for years, for independence. I am one who believes that we ought to give them their independence; and when we do, then the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota perhaps would be something we ought to engraft into our laws. But I protest against our Government levying a tax upon the people of the Philippine Islands while, without their will and without their consent, we are holding them in subjection. That goes away beyond any benefit that might come to anybody on account of such a tariff as is proposed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAREY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Was it not the attempt of Great Britain to dictate the economic life and development of the thirteen Colonies which led to the American Revolution?

Mr. NORRIS. That is as I understand it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That policy was pursued through the navigation laws.

Mr. NORRIS. As I tried to say a few minutes ago, it is the fundamental principle of our existence. If that principle had not been invoked, we probably would now be under the British flag instead of having one of our own.

With these helpless people—weak, unable, of course, to cope with us in strength—compelled to submit to whatever we say shall be the law, we ought to be careful, more careful than we would be if we were legislating for our own people, because the people of the Philippines are held without their consent, and we are taxing them without their representation.

I feel that it would be just as bad if we said that we would levy a tax upon the products of Florida before they would be permitted to cross the line into North Carolina. Our forefathers were so careful that such a thing should never be done that they put an inhibition into the Federal Constitution against it.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we can not afford to adopt this amendment levying a tax upon the products of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I feel very strongly about this matter. There is no question in my mind but that the Filipino has at least provincial status, somewhat on the terms under which Australia and Canada are connected with Great Britain. I agree with the Senator in what he has just said, but I would like to ask him whether he knows of any Supreme Court or other decision which would prevent our taxing articles coming from the Philippines. I was just wondering what the law is.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any Supreme Court or other judicial decision which denies that right. I am assuming that we could impose a tax. Although I have never looked the matter up, I believe we have a legal right to do it. I am not relying on any technicality. If it had been decided a million times that we had the right to do it, I would not be in favor of doing it.

I do not want our Government to perform an act which we can perform simply because we are strong, and against the people who are weak, if it is unjust, even though we have the technical legal right to do it.

Mr. WALCOTT. I entirely agree with the Senator's last statement. My question was not intended to indicate an opposite view.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I supplement and indorse what the rarely gifted Senator from Nebraska has so well stated by reminding the Senate that in the controversy over the independence of the thirteen Colonies the question was raised in the British Parliament, as it is here to-day, whether that Parliament, thousands of miles away, had the power legislatively to control the economic future of the thirteen Colonies by limiting and determining their markets without their consent? Led by Lord George Grenville, it was then argued by some of the advocates of such technical legal power that the power not only existed but should be employed. It was the contention of Edmund Burke, a far wiser statesman, whose judgment has been vindicated by history, that though the power existed, it should not be used to the disadvantage of a remote and unwilling colonial people under the same flag.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I agree with all the sentiments that have been expressed on the matter of taxation without representation and with all the beautiful sentiments that have been expressed by Senators as to how a government should govern and control a subject people. Seriously, I can not understand what that has to do with the case. The question of local taxes in the Philippine Islands has nothing to do with this matter. The question of taxing the Filipinos has nothing to do with it. The Filipinos will not pay one cent of tax under this amendment. They have a monopoly of coconut oil which is sent to the United States and they will still continue to have a monopoly. It is not claimed that less coconut oil will come in then than comes now. I am informed it will come here in just as large quantities as now. I am informed that copra will come here in the same quantity it comes now.

The effect of the amendment will not be an embargo; it will not hamper the exports of the Philippines and it will not cost the Filipinos one cent, because the extra tax that will be levied will be paid in the United States. The Oil Trust can pay twice its tax on its raw material without raising the price of the finished products they sell to the United States. Does anyone claim the oil tariff put upon oil was a tax upon the people of Venezuela? Will anyone deny it was a tax upon the American people? Is there anyone here who will claim that a tariff is not a tax upon the American people? Does anyone deny that the tax of $2 a ton on coal will raise the price of coal to the American people?

These imports will come here in the same quantities, I am informed, in which they have come in the past, and the revenue that will be raised will amount to about $25,000,000; so I fail to see where it will affect the economic welfare of the Philippine Islands.

Mention has been made of the capital invested in the Philippine Islands. That capital is not Philippine capital. It is American capital, English capital, and other European capital. This foreign capital is taking advantage of a sentimental situation artificially created to make enormous profits at the expense of the farmers of the United States. As a result the farmers of the United States are compelled to pay indirectly the cost of maintaining the Philippines under the American flag.

I yield to no one in my good wishes for the Philippine Islands. I have been ready ever since I came to the Senate to vote for their freedom. I am ready to vote it to-day. But this capital invested there has been able to play upon the sentiment of the American people to prevent the freedom of the Philippines and to prevent a tax upon the products which they use and which they obtain in competition with American products for the manufacture of soap. They have an advantage which they are not willing to give up.

The soap industry will not absorb, and does not want to absorb, this tax unless it has to do so. If it can be passed on to the American people, the American people will pay the tax of $25,000,000. Of course, it is a tax upon the American people. So is the tax upon automobiles. So is the tax upon checks. So is the tax upon coal. So is the tax upon oil. This will not lower the importation of the products involved. The incidental benefit to agriculture will be that it will have the incidental effect of increasing the price of the products of the farmer which now have to meet upon the market these imported articles which are imitations of products of the farmers. It is first of all, therefore, a revenue measure and incidentally it will have some effect upon the price of farm products.

Mr. BORAH. This amendment brings to our attention again the supreme necessity of disposing of the question of the independence of the Philippines. That is the large and important matter; and while it may be true, as said by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], that in a large measure this tax will fall upon the American people, it is equally true in my judgment that no real permanent advantage can be had by the American farmer with reference to trade in the Philippines until the Philippine question is settled, and settled permanently.

It is a matter of supreme importance to agriculture in this country. Agriculture is brought in contact and in competition with the cheapest labor in the world and with the most fertile soil in the world with reference to certain products.

I hope, Mr. President, that before this session closes we will take action upon the question of the independence of the Philippines. If we can do that with a bill based upon sound principles, we can render a real service to American agriculture—perhaps not immediately, because the question of the economic relations can not be solved immediately, but it can be solved within a reasonable time and to the advantage and protection of American agriculture.

I am not disposed to vote for the pending amendment, first, for the reason which has been stated by some of my colleagues, but secondly, because I do not regard it as reaching the real problem and settling the question as it ought to be settled. I must say, however, that if the Philippine Islands are not to be given their independence and economic relations with that country settled within a reasonable time, I am not in favor of making American agriculture carry this burden indefinitely. Undoubtedly we have the legal power to do what is proposed here to do. There is a question of ethics and morality in it, yet we have the legal power. There is another side also to the question of ethics and the question of just justice, and that is whether American agriculture should be compelled to carry indefinitely this burden which they are now carrying. I hope, therefore, that before the session closes we will settle the Philippine question. We should determine at this session a permanent policy toward the Philippines. If they are to have independence, let us determine that. If not, let us determine that. But let us try to establish a permanent policy and adjust our relation with the Philippines upon a permanent basis.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the pending amendment involves two distinct questions. One is a moral question of sustaining the established American position regarding the Philippines since our first occupancy of those islands. The other is a tariff question or a tax question.

A few days ago the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] introduced into the RECORD a letter from former Ambassador Forbes, who held many distinguished positions in the Philippines, has written a great book on the subject, and now is advocating Philippine independence and the passage of the Senate bill.

The first commission sent to the Philippine Islands was under President McKinley. He selected as the head of that commission Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, scholar, student, and historian, who was at that time president of Cornell University. I ask that a statement by Doctor Schurman, advocating the freedom of the Philippines, and advocating the passage of the Hawes-Cutting bill, be inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

[From the Pasadena Star-News, February 25, 1932]

PHILIPPINES' FREEDOM IS ADVOCATED—DR. JACOB G. SCHURMAN'S VIEWS PLAINLY GIVEN—COMPACT'S FRAMER IS EMPHATIC

"If the Filipinos themselves are willing to fill the higher governmental offices and to assume the problem of self-defense, we must recognize that it is their problem and leave the islands, whether we think we can run them better than they or not. We have formally agreed to this by act of Congress. Our own Government is based on the consent of the governed, and the Filipinos appeal to us on the same ground to grant them independence."

This unequivocal declaration was made in Pasadena last evening by the man who headed the first mission to the Philippines, Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman. He made it at the end of a lecture given in Dabney Lounge at the California Institute of Technology, and with deliberation, after explaining that he wished to be quite fair and not allow personal feelings to enter in. Doctor Schurman helped largely to frame the original compact with the Filipinos.

After an exhaustive review of events leading to and succeeding the Aguinaldo insurrection, Doctor Schurman made it clear that the Hawes-Cutting bill, now before Congress, should in the interests of justice be passed.

SIGNIFICANT DECLARATION

He referred also to its predecessor, the Jones law, which, he said, "gives to the Philippines practically all the powers of government that can be granted to a people short of complete sovereignty. The Philippines now," he continued, "are substantially in the hands of the Filipinos, with the exception that the highest officers are appointees of the President of the United States."

Doctor Schurman went on to quote the preamble of the Jones law, which he described as "the most important declaration of policy we have ever given." This is, he said, quoting, "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands."

The preamble goes on to state that "it has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, and to recognize their independence as soon as stable government can be established therein."

"COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE"

The law clearly points to the time when, as the preamble states, the Filipino "may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence," continued the speaker.

Consequently, the purpose of the Hawes-Cutting bill, now up in the Senate at Washington, is to provide for the withdrawal of United States sovereignty and for the granting of independence to the Filipinos.

Doctor Schurman pointed out that the Senate committee majority had reported strongly in favor of the bill, and that the minority report only raised questions of the wisdom of quitting the highest offices, the ability of the islanders to pay their own way, and the risking of outside aggression.

But, the distinguished diplomat and former president of Cornell University, added, in effect, if the Filipinos are prepared now to shoulder the full responsibilities of home rule, then it is up to the United States to withdraw and let them do it.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I have with considerable care tried to ascertain if there is in the Senate a single Senator who would oppose Philippine independence. I have not been informed that such a man exists. It is true that one Senator has a constitutional question to discuss, that another disagrees with the limitation and the time; but as to the general problem of granting independence to the Philippines and fixing a definite date, I can not find any opposition.

The House recorded itself in a most remarkable manner. Of 435 Members, approximately 350 have expressed themselves in favor of Philippine independence. During the last year there has been a marked change in the sentiment of our great magazines, our great newspapers, and without exception every independent investigator of the subject who has gone to the Philippines and studied the question favors the carrying out of our historic promise to those people.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, who has put in so much time on a consideration of this subject, are worthy of the attention of every Senator. While I shall not insist upon it, I should like the Senator to yield so I may suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, as I proceed I want to make it perfectly clear that the friends of Philippine independence do not want to occupy the time of the Senate when we have pressing and immediately distressing domestic conditions before us. I have pursued a policy since the early report of our committee of occupying very little time upon this subject in the Senate, so I prefer not to yield for a quorum call.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I mention the legislative situation because in a very short while I hope the Philippine independence bill will be passed. That bill deals specifically with these tariff questions. In the House bill and in the bill reported by the Senate committee there is a limitation placed upon the exports of the Philippine people. In the Senate bill there is a graduated tariff. So that within the next two or three weeks the question should solve itself in the Senate and in the American Congress, and therefore it is unfair now and is unnecessary to adopt the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I have never introduced political subjects in any discussions, either before the House when I was a Member of that body or before the Senate; but I can not believe it is possible that the Republican Senate would adjourn without passing upon the question of Philippine independence. It would be very unfortunate for the American people and very unfortunate for the Philippine people if we go to the country, if you please, with the Philippine independence bill passed by a Democratic House and the issue raised that a Republican Senate refuses to pass upon the same question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. As chairman of the committee which reported out the Senator's bill, may I say to him at this point, or repeat what I have said previously, that I shall be glad to join with him in any effort he may make to bring the bill to the attention of the Senate and to get it passed, because it seems to me that it is only fair to the Philippine Islands that this question be settled and that it should not be left in the air. I hope the Senator will press at the earliest opportunity to have this bill taken up and considered, and I shall be glad to lend any aid in my power to that end.

Mr. HAWES. I am certainly grateful to the Senator. I know the farmers of America are grateful to him, as are union labor and the exclusionists on the coast, but particularly the people of the Philippine Islands. It is impossible for them to adjust their economic condition or their political position until this question shall be determined.

I mentioned the unanimity of sentiment in the Senate for this reason: The consideration of the bill will not occupy many hours of discussion. Certainly a half hour will suit me. I believe the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] may possibly consume an hour, and perhaps the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who has a constitutional question in mind, may consume a half hour. I do not think the consideration of the bill could possibly occupy more than two afternoons or three evening sessions. Then the question will have been decided by a Democratic House and a Republican Senate, and it will meet the demand coming from all classes of our people for dispelling the present situation of uncertainty.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator state what is the status of the bill?

Mr. HAWES. The bill is not only on the calendar, but it is on the preferential calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I had the impression that the bill is on the preferential calendar.

Mr. HAWES. It follows the Muscle Shoals measure and one or two other bills. It is fourth on the preferential calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I assume, however, when the bill relative to economy shall be reported it will take preference, perhaps, over all other pending legislation, as will be the case also with reference to the proposal for emergency legislation providing a public-works program.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator is correct; but, so far as the friends of Philippine independence are concerned, we give way to those great public measures that are pressing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I notice the Senator from Missouri has in his hand the program of the steering committee. Will the Senator read that program as to the bills that are proposed to be taken up before the bill providing for Philippine independence?

Mr. HAWES. Calendar No. 298, the Navy bill, has been disposed of.

Then come the bill of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the joint resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Glass bill has been temporarily laid aside, has it not?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The George joint resolution, I assume, will be taken care of by the economy bill?

Mr. HAWES. I assume so.

Next on the calendar is the measure making an appropriation for emergency highway construction, which I believe will be covered in the same way.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. HAWES. Then comes the measure of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] with regard to Muscle Shoals, and then comes the Philippine independence measure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I concur in the Senator's judgment that it is very important, in the interest of stabilizing economic conditions in the Philippine Islands as well as political conditions, that we act as promptly as possible on the bill providing for the independence of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I suggest to the Senator that it ought to be possible, after we get the tax bill and the economy bill out of the way, to have two or three night sessions during the period when we are considering appropriation bills and when appropriation bills are in conference to consider the Philippine independence measure and to permit those who differ with the committee in regard to it to state their views and others who may desire to do so to speak? In that way we ought to be able to do what the Senator wishes, and what I am desirous of helping him do, without interfering with the consideration of the necessary revenue and appropriation bills.

Mr. HAWES. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. President, I find that the Democratic leader of the Senate, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is entirely sympathetic with the idea of an early vote on the Philippine independence bill and that the same statement may be made with reference to the leader of the majority, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator did not state what is the situation in reference to this measure in the House of Representatives. Is there a similar bill pending in that body?

Mr. HAWES. The House passed the bill by approximately 350 votes out of 436.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I recall that now. So all that is necessary for us to do is to substitute the proposal of the Senator from Missouri and have the bill go to conference?

Mr. HAWES. That is all.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the House bill is now on the calendar, having been reported from the committee with the House text stricken out and the text of the bill offered by the Senator from Missouri in the Senate in lieu thereof?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator for refreshing my memory about that.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, returning to the amendment which I have suggested, my attention was called during the discussion of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill to this same problem in its relation to sugar. At that time the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] fought very long and vigorously to place a tax upon sugar coming from the Philippine Islands. It was during that discussion that my attention was directed to this phase of the subject. I believe that it attracted the attention of the people of the United States, and certainly had a great bearing on our deliberations both in the House and the Senate committees. We tried to comply with the thought of limitation and the thought of a tariff, but these two things should be coupled only after independence has been decided upon.

Mr. President, beginning in 1909, each of our Secretaries of State and our Secretaries of War have protested before House and Senate committees against any discrimination of the Philippine Islands at this time. Every Governor General whom we have sent to represent us in the Philippine Islands similarly has protested. It seems to me that it would be a most unfair thing to discriminate against these people at this time, and particularly because probably within the next 30 days the question of their permanent status and relations with the United States will be definitely determined. My amendment does not interfere with the imposition of a tax, if it is the voice of the Senate that one should be imposed, upon the importation of copra from all the rest of the world. All the amendment does is to protect the people in our colonial possessions while we control them, while they are under our sovereignty, from having a distinction drawn which would be not only obnoxious to them but unfair.

Our own products go there in unlimited quantities, to the profit of American manufacturers. The islands can not, under our direction, tax foreign imports coming to them. So, from every point of view, the historical, the economic, and because of approaching independence for those islands, I hope that the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have been requested by a number of Senators to suggest the absence of a quorum when the debate on this question was concluded. I do so at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Hull	Sheppard
Bailey	Couzens	Johnson	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Shortridge
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Smith
Barkley	Dickinson	Kendrick	Smoot
Bingham	Dill	La Follette	Steiwer
Blaine	Fess	Lewis	Stephens
Borah	Fletcher	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Frazier	Long	Townsend
Brookhart	George	McGill	Trammell
Broussard	Glass	McNary	Tydings
Bulkley	Glenn	Moses	Vandenberg
Bulow	Goldsborough	Neely	Wagner
Byrnes	Hale	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Caraway	Hastings	Patterson	Watson
Carey	Hatfield	Pittman	Wheeler
Cohen	Hawes	Reed	White
Connally	Hayden	Robinson, Ark.
Coolidge	Hebert	Robinson, Ind.
Copeland	Howell	Schall

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the vote. It is my purpose now merely to state that I think the incorporation of tariff items in this bill is to be condemned, and that it is particularly objectionable to impose taxes on imports from the possessions of the United States.

There is pending now in the Senate a bill to assure the independence of the Philippine Islands upon conditions and within a reasonable time. There is practically no opposition to that bill in the Senate. When I say that, I mean that if a vote were taken, the bill, with such modifications as the Senate might see fit to impose, would be enacted by an overwhelming vote. During this session I think the Senate ought to vote on that bill; but it is particularly objectionable to carry this tariff-making process, these protective provisions, to the extent that they may apply to imports from territory possessed by the United States.

I should like to elaborate this thought, but, realizing that the Senate is ready for a vote, I shall refrain from doing so.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator remember that one of our possessions, which I had the honor of visiting with him, has for its sole product copra, which is mentioned in this amendment; and that if a tax is put on copra, it would practically ruin the Samoan Islands, which depend for their entire revenue and their entire economic activity on the product known as copra?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement of the Senator from Connecticut is entirely correct. We have the power, and if we wish to exercise that power we can destroy the prospects for advancement of peoples occupying territory belonging to the United States by the exercise of the constitutional authority to levy import duties; but I should regard it as an act of tyranny that can not be characterized in any other way.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I assume that the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the offer of the amendment by the Senator from Minnesota and the necessary amendment by the Senator from Missouri disclose the necessity of acting at an early date upon the question of Philippine independence.

As has been stated by the Senator from Arkansas, and it need not be restated, we consider it immoral to place a tariff tax on these people while we have sovereignty over their islands and over them. As the Senator said, there is no particular opposition in the Senate to the passage of the Philippine independence bill. It should be acted on without very much debate. The only real difference of opinion, as I understand, is as to details. There are a few in this country—a very few—who hold the view that no date should be fixed for independence. That view will not be sustained in this body, I think, by any Senator.

The period of time intervening between the preparation for independence and independence was a subject of discussion. It was realized, of course, that there must be preparation, that there must be adjustment, and the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs gave that matter very careful study for many weeks and came to a unanimous agreement except with regard to certain details.

The bill provides that the Philippine Islands may become independent from and after 15 years from the passage of the act, if by a plebiscite the Philippine people vote in favor of it, but if they do not vote in favor of it, then the conditions as they are will continue to exist.

The bill goes further than that. It provides that the first thing that shall be done is to adopt a constitution. The bill contains mandatory provisions to be included in that constitution. Those mandatory provisions, in my opinion, carry every protection of the people of the Philippine Islands and of our own citizens that is carried in the Constitution of the United States. That constitution must be prepared, the first thing that is done, and it must be submitted to the President of the United States for his determination as to whether or not it contains the mandatory constitutional provisions for protection that are included in this bill.

In other words, the bill sets out a constitution. When that is prepared by a constitutional convention in the Philippine Islands, it is then sent by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands to the President, and he determines the question as to whether or not that constitution contains all of the mandatory provisions prescribed in the bill. If it does, then it is sent back to the Philippine Islands, and it still does not become their constitution until it has been adopted by a vote of the people of the Philippine Islands.

There is another provision; that is, that having adopted this constitution, the government of the islands then becomes an autonomous government in a sense; but during the period of the autonomous government down to the time that the islands become independent after the period of 15 years by a plebiscite vote, they pledge themselves in the constitution to swear allegiance to the United States and the sovereignty of the United States is not disturbed.

There are, however, other tests made of them than that.

We have found the very difficulty in Congress that is now aroused by this amendment and the amendment to it; that is, there is no question but that our farmers are suffering to a certain extent from competition with imports from the Philippine Islands. There is complaint that our labor is suffering from immigration from those islands; and yet we meet exactly the same objection that has been met in Congress before—that it is immoral on our part to attempt to apply the laws that we apply to foreign countries to the Philippines so long as they are under our sovereignty and control.

The Philippine commission, on behalf of the Philippine people, recognize that this competition with regard to agricultural products and labor is disagreeable to our people; and they have willingly and voluntarily agreed with our committee that the status quo of imports from the Philippine Islands may be maintained for the period of the first 10 years, that they shall not be increased, and that all imports from the Philippine Islands over and above the present status quo shall be subjected to our tariff laws. They also provide that from the very beginning of the autonomous government, which takes place upon the adoption of the constitution, immigration to this country shall be limited to 100 individuals per annum. Those are things that we desire to accomplish. Those are things that are perfectly agreeable to the people of the Philippine Islands.

That is not all. At the end of 10 years, while their autonomous government is still in existence, they subject themselves to taxation on their exports to the United States. During the eleventh year, on those things that they have been allowed to bring in free for 10 years, they pay 5 per cent tax; the next year, 10 per cent; the next year, 15 per cent; the next year, 20 per cent; and after that, during the period of the autonomous government, 25 per cent. That is, on the things that come in under the status quo free for the first 10 years—they pay the ordinary tariff duties on all above that—they start in at the end of 10 years to pay tariff duties on those things that have previously come in free under the quota.

Of course, if and when independence is voted after 15 years, then all of our immigration laws and all of our tax laws apply to the Philippine Islands, just the same as they apply to any other country.

Objections have been made by one or two that there should be no date fixed for independence. They say, "Wait 20 or 25 years and find out whether the people of the Philippine Islands have reached sufficient advancement for independence." That is a denial of independence. The Senate is not going to deny independence.

The questions the committee had to determine were as to the reasonable time for preparation, and the reasonable conditions which should be imposed in the meantime.

In the first place, we tried to maintain the status quo of exports from the Philippine Islands during the time of the autonomous government, so that they could not increase. In the second place, we tried to teach the Filipino government as to the complications they would find when they did obtain independence. So we started in, with their approval, on a gradually rising tariff on the quota imports after 10 years. Mind you, we had in mind to apply our tariff laws to them, but they made a suggestion to us that was far superior; that is, they would impose those taxes in the form of an export tax, and that they would take the money they earned from the export tax and place it in a special fund for the purpose of amortizing the bonds and securities they had issued, and for which our Government is morally if not legally responsible.

So that when they do, after 15 years, vote for absolute independence, every bond, every indebtedness of that government will be wiped out. They further agreed at that time to assume all responsibilities after the 15 years.

Let me go further. Not only do they, during the period of the autonomous government, and the period of 15 years at the end of which they vote upon the question of independence, carry these mandatory constitutional provisions, but there is retained in the President of the United States practical control over the economics and finances of the islands, and over their actions respecting any foreign country. It is expressly provided that the President may suspend any act of that government which threatens the financial condition of the islands, or the violation of any obligation undertaken by the government of the islands or by the Government of the United States.

That is an extraordinary power, but the representatives of the Philippine government are satisfied that their autonomous government will do nothing to threaten the financial condition of the Philippine Islands, or to threaten in any way the constitutional government of the islands, or to do anything that will disturb the relations of the Philippine Islands or the United States with any foreign country. So they have themselves vested in the President of the United States absolute power and control to suspend any law that would threaten such misfortunes.

It seems to me that the representatives of the Philippine Islands have been not only fair but that they have been broad in meeting the demands of our Government, not only with regard to what we consider the protection of their own future existence but for the protection of our own citizens and our own property in the islands. Do Senators realize that in this act, agreed to by the Philippine delegation, our Government is allowed to retain forever, if it sees fit, several hundred thousand acres of land in the Philippine Islands; that it may retain its present naval bases, its Army bases, its posts, and all of those reservations; that it may maintain in fee simple forever every selection our Government has made through the War Department, the Navy Department, the Interior Department, or any other department of our Government, for the use and benefit of the United States?

Mr. President, the chief value of this bill at the present time is not only that it has been carefully worked out for the protection of the Philippine people and their future government as we see it, but that it has been worked out just as carefully for the protection of our Government and our citizens as we see it. Above and beyond all that, it has been gladly and readily accepted, not only by the committee of the United States Senate but by the representatives of the Philippine people.

It is a happy solution of this question. All have met in the friendliest spirit. All stand for independence. There were some few minor objections with regard to the power, we will say, of the Governor General under the bill, or called, as he might be, the high commissioner. Former Ambassador Forbes to Japan, who was Governor General of the Philippine Islands for years, who studied the Philippine question for years, indorsed the Hawes-Cutting bill heartily, but he suggested that there were two or three minor amendments which he thought should be adopted, and those amendments have been offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], one of the coauthors of the bill, and undoubtedly will be accepted.

This measure is ready to pass. It is ready for acceptance. There may be a few detailed amendments and changes in it, but the general thought behind the whole bill is unanimous. We are ready to act on it. It is on the legislative program at the present time. It should be acted on, in my opinion, and will be acted on.

Therefore I say that amendments which controvert the policy and the principle agreed on by our committee with the representatives of the Philippine government and the Philippine people should not at this time be permitted to pass.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am tremendously interested in Senate bill 3377, introduced by the very able Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. The bill is now on the calendar and has received very studious and careful consideration by the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and whatever I may have to do with the conduct of affairs on the floor of the Senate, I shall further the early consideration of that measure.

Of course, the Senator from Missouri realizes that as we approach the end of the session there is more or less of a congestion, but inasmuch as that bill touches on the freedom of the Philippine people it is an important measure. I shall give it my very loyal support.

Touching on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, in view of the legislation now on the calendar, referring, as it does to a graduated tax, an impost-duty system, and the ultimate independence of the Philippine people, it is my judgment that it should not at this time be injected into a revenue bill in the way of an amendment. If it were the only possible opportunity for reaching the situation close to the heart of the senior Senator from Minnesota, it would be very well for us to consider it, but inasmuch as a measure dealing in a general way with this whole important subject matter is on the calendar and is ready for action, and the opportunity will soon come to us to act on it, it is my judgment that we should exclude the Philippines from the operation of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. For that reason I shall oppose the amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I can not take any position different from that I took a couple of years ago when a tariff bill was before us. I offered an amendment to the tariff bill to grant independence to the Philippine Islands, or to take the preliminary steps looking to that end, and then sought to have imposed a tariff upon the sugar imported from the Philippine Islands. I pointed out the fact that the oils imported from the Philippine Islands were doing great harm to the agricultural people and to the dairy people of this country.

Therefore I shall vote for the pending amendment, although I can quite agree with the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Nevada, and the Senator from Missouri, that if we enact the pending bill there might be some amendment offered which might correct what we are trying to accomplish along the lines of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

When House bill 7233 came to the Senate, I offered an amendment which I believe it necessary to reoffer to the Senate bill. I would like to have the clerk read the amendment, and have it printed. It is offered as an amendment to the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BROUSSARD to the bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, viz: On page 25 strike out lines 17 to 23, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There shall be levied, collected, and paid on refined and unrefined sugars coming from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That for the first year of the existence of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands 50,000 long tons of refined sugar and 800,000 long tons of unrefined sugar shall be exempt from the payment of said duty, and that for the second year the amounts of refined and unrefined sugars herein provided to be admitted free of duty shall be reduced by 5 per cent, for the third year by 10 per cent, for the fourth year by 15 per cent, for the fifth year by 25 per cent, for the sixth year by 40 per cent, for the seventh year by 60 per cent, for the eighth year by 85 per cent, and thereafter, and until final independence is granted, full duties shall be paid."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Louisiana desires to have this amendment printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with what the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has said with reference to attempting to place a duty on articles coming in from the Philippine Islands. I agree that it would be immoral for the Congress of the United States, while holding the Philippine Islands, to place duties upon imports from those islands.

I want to say further that the reason why there is so much clamor at this time for increased tariffs on the part of the copper miners and on the part of every other industry is because of the difference in the rate of exchange between the money of this country, which is upon the gold standard, and the money of countries which are off the gold standard. So far the Congress of the United States has not seen fit to meet the fundamental thing that is wrong in this country to-day.

I first want to read an article by Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange, and I understand late a candidate for the Senate in the State of Ohio on the Republican ticket:

IRON DEBTS AND RUBBER MONEY

By L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange

If the farmer borrowed a dollar in 1919 and must pay that dollar to-day on the present price index, he must pay $2.33 for every dollar borrowed. Coming down to as late as 1928, if a farmer borrowed a dollar and must pay it back at the present price index, he must pay $2.08. Averaging it over the last 15 years for agriculture, measured in terms of products, it means he must pay $2.25½ for every dollar he has borrowed.

These figures indicate that the interest rate, if you figure on a basis of 6 per cent, computed on the basis of the present price of farm commodities, is now 13.5 per cent; and if the rate is taken at 8 per cent, the farmer must now pay 18.5 per cent interest.

What has happened to agriculture in the way of paying debts at the present level of commodity prices is graphically told in the subjoined table. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture is authority for the statement that the farm barometer in January stood at 66. Comparing to-day's farm prices with the former price index, the table below shows in terms of what the farmer has to sell just how much he has to pay in the way of farm crops for each dollar borrowed during each of the years indicated in the table.

[Department of Agriculture statistics. Other figures from Yearbook]

Index	Year	Equivalent payments required to-day
117	1930	$1.77
133	1929	2.02
137	1928	2.08
138	1927	2.09
129	1926	1.96
143	1925	2.17
142	1924	2.15
132	1923	2.00
130	1922	1.97
119	1921	1.80
152	1920	2.30
220	1919	3.33
203	1918	3.08
192	1917	2.91
146	1916	2.25

This table indicates the average for the past 15 years required that the farmer must give the equivalent of $2.25½ for every dollar borrowed when forced to pay at to-day's price level.

In other words, 6 per cent interest is equivalent to 13.5; 7 per cent interest is equivalent to 15.75; 8 per cent interest is equivalent to 18.8. This is an impossible situation.

The commodity price level must be raised to approximately the same level upon which our debts were contracted. Unfortunately the banker to whom we pay our money receives no benefit from the fact that we must give him more than $2, measured by commodities, for every dollar borrowed. What we must do is to raise the price level through restoring the volume of currency or else face disaster.

Mr. President, I have contended from the very inception of this session of the Congress that the fundamental thing that is wrong in this country to-day is the contraction of debt and the contraction of our currency, and that the one way in which this could be met is to have a sufficient inflation of our currency and our credit to place them back in approximately the position where we were in the year 1926. When the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] was speaking the other day he spoke of honest dollars; and he intimated that if we raise the price of commodities, if we had an inflation sufficient to raise commodity prices to the level of 1926, we would have a dishonest dollar in this country. I submit, Mr. President, that the bill which I introduced some time ago for the remonetization of silver so as to increase primary money, not only of this country but throughout the world, would do more than any piece of legislation which has thus far been advanced in this Congress to bring back the commodity price levels of products throughout the United States. Some one has said that the Government of the United States would not be able to remonetize silver by itself; but let me invite the attention of those who are at all doubtful about the situation to the fact that if this country itself should, independently of any other country in the world, remonetize silver we would immediately take from Great Britain all of her trade in the Orient, in China and in India, and in the rest of the Orient. It would immediately force Great Britain, which is now off the gold standard, to a bimetallic standard in order to hold her trade. I doubt if there is any economist in the United States or in the world to-day who would contend for one moment that Great Britain and her colonies, together with the United States of America, could not maintain bimetallism and that it would not be beneficial to the people of this country and to the people generally throughout the world.

Some Members of the Senate will recall that when we had before us the so-called Glass-Steagall bill, sponsored by the administration, and the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] was speaking in favor of the bill, I asked him the question, "Will the Senator please tell me how it is possible for this bill or any provision in the bill to raise the commodity price level of products that have to be sold upon the world markets?" The Senator at that time answered in substance that if the bill is enacted into law and is put upon the statute books of the United States of America, we would soon become a gold Gibraltar, smoke would soon be coming out of the chimneys, the railroads would be busy, and the price of farm commodities would then rise.

I said then and I say again that not a solitary thing we have done since the Congress of the United States has convened in this session has been with the view to raising or at least it has not raised the commodity-price level of products that have to be sold upon the world market. We have seen the President come forward and issue a statement saying that immediately, if the moratorium was passed, immediately if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was passed, immediately if the Glass-Steagall bill was passed, and immediately if this or that piece of legislation was passed, then prosperity would return and commodity-price levels would immediately rise.

It seems to me that any economist who had ever studied the fundamentals of economy in any high school in the United States of America ought to know better than to say that we could raise the commodity-price level of products that have to be sold upon the world market either by passing the Glass-Steagall bill or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill or any single piece of legislation that has been advocated at this session of Congress. Yet we see men rising in the Senate of the United States, as did the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and saying what we need in this country is a Mussolini, and on another occasion saying that unless we do this or that we will have no Government in the United States. But I say that if we do not have any Government in the United States it will be because of the stupidity of the leadership of the Republican Party and those in control of the Congress of the United States of America.

It has been suggested to me sotto voce that I should not overlook the Democrats, and I agree that it is regrettable—it is exceedingly regrettable to me—to find that on this side of the Chamber as well as on the other side of the Chamber there has not been any legislation advanced for the purpose of doing anything to bring up the commodity price level of products that have to be sold on the world market. It is perfectly absurd, it seems to me, to think that putting out a little bit more money to the railroads of the country, while it might have been necessary to stop them from going into the hands of receivers; putting a little more money into the banks of the country, while we might have stopped some banks from going broke, would justify anyone in saying that prosperity can return in this country until the farmer can get enough for his products so his purchasing power is restored, so he can pay off the indebtedness which he owes.

Let me quote a statement from Mr. Arthur Brisbane, written in all the Hearst papers and carried in the Washington Herald of May 15. No one, I am sure, will contend that Mr. Brisbane is anything but a conservative of conservatives, and yet he said:

President Hoover reminds Congress that the National Government can use "emergency powers" now as in war.

There is no lack of power in the Federal Government, and the President, with the Russian Czar and Turkish Sultan thrown into time's wastebasket, is the most powerful ruler on earth.

The thing is to decide what ought to be done and then do it.

The trouble is that our great engineer at the other end of the Avenue has decided a dozen different times in a dozen different ways about the situation. He sent here to the Congress of the United States some remedy which he said was immediately going to restore confidence and immediately raise commodity prices, immediately going to start the smoke coming out of the chimneys and bring back prosperity, if you please. I think the most serious charge that can be made against the President of the United States of America is that from the very beginning of this depression never once has he visualized what the real situation was in the United States. Consequently, never having visualized what the trouble was in the United States, he never was able to send to the Congress a measure containing a constructive proposal for the relief of the present situation.

Let me invite attention to a fact that has been so often repeated, that in 1929 this great engineer said, "Prosperity is just around the corner," and that we were going to "have prosperity soon." Again he said prosperity would be back again in 60 days. Then he issued another and still another statement, and each time that he issued a statement the prices of commodities dropped throughout the country. Not only did the prices of commodities drop, but the prices upon the stock market, after being boomed a few days, would again sag down. Here we are about to close this session of Congress and the only thing we hear from the White House is to the effect that we must balance the Budget. That has become the President's latest cry.

Mr. Brisbane stated further:

We know three things that are needed—confidence, money, and employment.

How are we going to get confidence, how can we expect the people to have confidence in the United States or in their President and their Congress, when the President of the United States and our leading business men and our leading statesmen on the other side of the Chamber are constantly saying that "prosperity is just around the corner," and then the people discovering that they have been misled? How can we expect to have confidence in this country when we have a man in the White House who has not at any time visualized in this whole depression what was wrong with the country and has not had the temerity to come to Congress and tell the Congress of the United States how to remedy it if he did visualize it? I think the trouble is that he never has visualized the true condition.

Mr. Brisbane continued:

We know three things that are needed—confidence, money, and employment.

The Government has power to provide all three.

It could print the money needed and, with the name United States of America on it, that would be the best money in the world.

The other day the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], in speaking of silver, called attention to the fact that practically all the bonds of the United States of America are payable in gold and said that all of the mortgages are payable in gold. But let me call attention to the fact that we have a lot of money in this country to-day that is not backed up by gold. We have silver certificates which, as a matter of fact, are really worth to-day about 30 cents on the dollar.

When a bond is to be paid, if silver certificates are offered, does anyone question whether he should take them? Not at all. Does anyone to-day hesitate in payment of a gold bond to take greenbacks which were issued many years ago? Not at all, Mr. President; and if we should remonetize silver, no one would for one second hesitate to take silver just so long as he knew the Government of the United States was back of the currency it issued. If silver were remonetized, however, we would have more primary money in this country. It would immediately increase the purchasing power of the Orient; it would increase the purchasing power of India; it would increase the purchasing power of China; it would increase the purchasing power of Mexico; it would increase the purchasing power of the Central and South American countries, and they would then be in a position to buy from us automobiles and other commodities. It would do more for the automobile industry than anything that could possibly happen. It would start the wheels of industry in this country as nothing else would start them, if we had the courage and if we had somebody at the other end of the Avenue who had the courage to take a stand with reference to this question.

Mr. Brisbane suggests:

It could print the money needed, and with the name "United States of America" on it, that would be the best money in the world.

Do you doubt it? You would take any plain piece of paper marked "I O U $100,000,000, John D. Rockefeller," and you would not discount it by as much as an eighth of 1 per cent, if you were sure of the signature. The world will take Uncle Sam's I O U up to ten billions and twice that.

When we are talking about the gold standard and the necessity of having gold with which to pay debts, let me call attention to the fact that the debts of the farmers of this country alone are equal to more than all the gold in the world; there is not gold enough in the world to-day to more than pay the indebtedness of the farmers of this country alone.

The difficulty is that our financial powers are accustomed to get their rake-off, in the way of commission and interest, on any money that the Government creates. The financial powers are also the Government, since they control it.

Is there any Senator on the floor of the Senate to-day who doubts the statement made by Mr. Brisbane?

They will not allow Uncle Sam to use his credit except through money lent by them; and if they happen not to have it, or if they are frightened to death, as at present, and can not or will not supply what is needed, except on usurious terms, they will not let the Government operate free of their financial tutelage.

The President would exercise "emergency powers" wisely if he would simply say, "What money the Government needs, it will print and use, without permission from financial small fry that are creatures of Government power." If that be inflation, make the most of it. But please note that payment with money thus issued will be legal payment of any obligation within the boundaries of the United States.

In war, the emergency calls for men; their blood and their lives. The Government did not hesitate to take 3,000,000 men, ship them 3,000 miles, pay them next to nothing, and require risk of life from all of them. The protests of mothers did not count. It was an emergency.

This is an emergency in which cash is needed. Why must the Government now pay more attention to some asinine financier, afraid of losing profits, than it pays in war time to a mother, afraid of losing her son?

The explanation and the fact is that our Government is a financial enterprise, controlled by financiers. We have not had a President to resist that financial power since Andrew Jackson.

Congress proposes to investigate silver and discover what is the matter with it. The President is said to approve if gold is included in the investigation.

This country, a great silver producer, fights to knock down all silver's price in favor of gold, produced in America on a very small scale. The amount of silver produced the world over for many years past has averaged less than thirteen times the amount, weight for weight, of gold produced. But gold, instead of selling at twelve, or twenty times the price of silver, sells at more than sixty times the price of silver. And of eighteen hundred million human beings on earth, sixteen hundred millions have practically no gold.

Why does gold sell for a price sixty times greater than that of silver? It is because of the fact that the governments of the world fix the price of gold but do not fix the price of silver.

Just what they are to use "for money," in buying from us, seems a problem. The British have dropped the gold standard and are prospering. We hang to it desperately, as though our only possession were our few pitiful billions of gold, and you know what is happening to us. You know, also, what is happening to our gold. Europe, France especially, draws it out of our vaults at the rate of ten and twenty millions a day.

Uncle Sam is like an old Fafnir, with a thousand leeches sucking his golden blood.

So, Mr. President, I am sure we are going to conclude this session of Congress without enacting any legislation that would really accomplish anything to enhance the price levels of the commodities the farmer produces. Is it any wonder that people are clamoring at the doors of Congress asking for a tariff upon this and a tariff upon that, asking that we put a tariff wall around this country to shut ourselves in, asking for relief of all kinds, when we have not the courage to face the real problem which confronts the country? Is it any wonder that groups of farmers are coming here and groups of this kind and groups of that kind and groups of the other kind and making their demands? There is a hysteria in this country just now as much as there was during the war; there is a hysteria because of the fact that the Congress of the United States has not the intestinal stamina to meet the situation that faces the country and seek to remedy it. It is because, Mr. President—and I dislike to say it—that a few men in the city of New York who have controlled this Government, who have controlled our finances, and to whom we have looked as the only ones who had any wisdom and any understanding of the financial problems of the Nation and of the world are dictating the financial policies of our Government at this time. Have we not the courage or have we not the ability in the face of their opposition to remedy the situation? Senators stand on the floor of this body and say "This Government is going to be destroyed; we need a Mussolini." We do not need a Mussolini in this country, Mr. President, and this Government of ours is going to endure. I am not a pessimist; I say to you, Mr. President, that the people of the United States will never stand for a Mussolini, but sooner or later they are going to wake up and are going to demand that their timid representatives in Congress and in the Senate and their President remedy the situation in the way that it should be remedied and, in my judgment, in the only way that it can be remedied.

Let me call attention, Mr. President, to a letter which I have received from the cashier of the First National Bank of Roxton, Tex., dated January 26. He says:

We have read the newspaper extracts from your speech on the money-and-debt question made in the Senate yesterday. Your utterance was a great one. It was the first public utterance that I have noticed that really touched the vital spot of the trouble. You say that people must be allowed to "pay their debts in the same kind of money, the same unit value, that they were made in." That is the crux of the whole thing. It is the mountains of cheap-dollar debts—debts made on the smaller war-induced units of money—all the billions and billions of national, international, and especially private debts made up to 1920 on the smaller units of money that the world is now trying to be forced to pay in the biggest dollars and pounds in all history that is ruining the world.

The effort to deliver double and quadruple has absorbed and is absorbing all the purchasing power of the people; for a lack of consumption values have fallen, business has stopped, and pandemonium is about to break loose. There are not five men in a million that yet know what is the matter. * * * An impossibility has been tried. Debts—doubled and quadrupled debts—are eating up all the consuming power while goods stack up, prices fall, factories stop; while the very people who have produced all the food and clothing are now hungry and cold.

Mr. President, is it any wonder that European governments are knocking at our door asking us for moratoria, saying that they can not pay? Of course they can not pay. Is there anybody so absurdly silly or foolish as to think that with present world commodity prices the governments of Europe can pay us? Is there any Senator so silly as to think for one second that the farmers of this country can pay the indebtedness which they owe with the prices of corn and wheat and cotton where they are today?

I say to you, Mr. President, I say to Senators in this body, that unless Congress raises the commodity price level of farm products, one of two things is going to happen—we are either going to have general bankruptcy in this country or we are going to have a general repudiation of all farm indebtedness and of practically all other indebtedness throughout this Nation and throughout the world. Senators can take one horn of the dilemma or the other; but there has either got to be a complete repudiation of indebtedness throughout the world or else the other thing will have to be done, and that is to raise commodity price levels; that has got to be done, and it has got to be done very quckly.

I know, Mr. President, very well what the scheme of things is at the present time. I appreciate that the word has gone out from the financiers of Wall Street, and I know who is back of the movement. I know that finally many of them have now come to the conclusion that something has got to be done to raise commodity price levels. I appreciate that the administration is now carrying out their policy in having the Federal Reserve Board buy Government bonds at the rate of $100,000,000 a week; but I say, with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], that I am unable to see how it is possible by buying Government bonds from the banks to raise the price levels of products that have to be sold upon the world market, unless the process is carried to such an extent as to take us completely off the gold standard. I do not think, Mr. President, that anybody who has given any thought or any study to the subject will for one minute challenge that statement. We might have arrested the depression in 1929 by buying Government bonds in the open market as the Federal Reserve Board is doing now. We might have helped materially in 1930 or 1931, but why, if it is a good thing now, was it not done before everyone had lost confidence and become hysterical to the extent of thinking we were going to ruin overnight? Why did not the President have the Reserve Board use the powers to buy Government bonds in the open market in 1929, 1930, and 1931? Why? Because he and his advisers thought prosperity was just around the corner. They never visualized the real situation, and I sometimes doubt they do to-day:

The cashier of this bank goes on to say:

> That effort after the war to shove back to the pre-war standard was the economic error of the ages. No such harebrained thing was ever attempted on such a scale before. Of course, the same trick had been worked in some nations after other wars, but this war was so big that the trick would not work. It is swamping the world.

I called attention upon the floor of the Senate in the speech that I made with reference to my bill some time ago to how during the war we had this tremendous inflation of credit—credit upon credit—and practically all the countries of the world went off the gold standard. Then I called attention to how the great financial interests, the international bankers, met at Basel, and at some other city in Europe that slips my memory at the present time, and sought to drive all the countries back upon the gold standard, and they did it. We loaned gold to Germany in order to put Germany back on the gold standard. These international bankers went in and put practically every great country upon the gold standard. We not only loaned Germany money to put her back upon the gold standard, but we canceled part of her indebtedness so as to make it possible for her to go back on the gold standard. Yet because of the fact that commerce and trade and debts had piled up throughout the world to such an enormous extent, it was impossible for these countries to stay upon the gold standard, and finally England, after going back, had to get off the gold standard again. The greatest, strongest power of all the powers in the world, with the exception of the United States, could not stay on the gold standard; and yet the little group of international bankers who absolutely dominate and control the finances of this country will not let us do and the Congress and the President of the United States do not dare to do the thing that is necessary to be done in order to bring up the price of commodities and bring back prosperity in this country.

Talk about fiddling while Rome burns. Talk about needing a Mussolini. We do not need a Mussolini to control the workingmen and the farmers of this country, but we need somebody at the other end of the Avenue who has the intestinal stamina to defy the little handful of international bankers who have brought this country to the very brink of ruin.

The cashier of this bank goes on to say:

> The people are watching Washington, watching for a sign—a sign that there is going to be a change of policy, that there is going to be a reversal of the policy that has ruined the world. They have not seen much signs of that sign until they read your speech. Now hope begins to rise—

And so forth. He says further:

> If there is not a reversal, if something is not done to put more dollar value into things, there can be no revival of business.

This is only one of hundreds upon hundreds of letters that I have received from little bankers and from various economists throughout the country pointing out the necessity of doing something with reference to the remonetization of silver.

Here is the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, the most powerful committee in the United States Senate and the most powerful committee in the Congress of the United States, a man who I know is interested in and believes that the remonetization of silver would be beneficial to this country, yet, Mr. President, my bill is before his committee, and——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Banking and Currency Committee is considering the silver bills.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon; my bill is before the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The Banking and Currency Committee have had all the other bills.

Mr. WHEELER. My bill is before the Finance Committee. The Senator from Utah is the chairman of the committee—the most powerful committee of the Senate. Statements have been carried in the press of this country to the effect that the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee is in favor of the remonetization of silver. Not only that, but the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], has recently issued a statement to the effect that he is in favor of the remonetization of silver. Not only that, but many other distinguished Republicans on the other side, and many distinguished Democrats in this body, have said that they are in favor of the remonetization of silver, and believe that it is a thing that should be done in order to bring back the commodity price level of those things that have to be sold upon the world market, and in order to start the wheels of industry and to increase the purchasing power, as I said a moment ago, of all of the South American and Latin-American countries.

The fact that we are on the gold standard and the other countries are off the gold standard, is the thing that makes it possible for the African companies to ship their copper to this country and lay it down in New Jersey for 5 cents a pound. That is one of the reasons, my friends, why these people from Arizona are here clamoring for a tariff upon copper. It is the reason why all of the other peoples, all over the United States, are coming here clamoring for relief of this sort and of that sort. It is because Congress has not dared to fly in the face of this little group of international bankers, and do its duty to the people of this country.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a petition signed by numerous people in favor of my bill and for the remonetization of silver.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> We, the undersigned citizens of Roosevelt County, Mont., believing that agriculture is one of our basic industries and that the economic security of our Nation is dependent upon the economic security of the American farm, favor such legislation as will provide for the solvency of the American farmer.

We believe that the only way out of the present depression is to raise commodity prices and thereby reduce the burden of debt. Under the present gold standard debts contracted three years ago, if paid this year, would require three times the amount in farm commodities as when they were contracted. All of the important countries of the world have gone off the gold standard; it is therefore impossible for us to trade with them. This keeps commodity prices down.

We feel that if prosperity is to return to this country, we must go off the gold standard, which is the cause for most of our economic ills.

We therefore respectfully petition the Senate of the United States of America to pass the Wheeler silver bill, S. 2487, which provides for the remonetization of silver by providing for the free coinage of silver as well as gold at the fixed ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw my substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. There seems to me some uncertainty about it; and I ask that the amendment which I send to the desk may take its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment in the nature of a substitute heretofore offered by the Senator from Missouri is withdrawn, and in its place the Senator from Missouri offers the amendment which will be stated by the clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all of line 1 after the word "copra" down to and including the word "Islands," in line 2.

Strike out all of line 7 after the word "oil" down to and including the word "countries," in line 8.

On page 2, after line 7, add a new paragraph to read as follows:

(12) None of the taxes herein described in paragraphs (9), (10), and (11) shall apply to any articles imported from the Philippine Islands or other possessions of the United States.

Mr. HAWES. That amendment simply excludes the Philippine Islands and our other colonial possessions from the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope there will be no necessity of voting upon the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]

Of course I understand that under the parliamentary procedure, this amendment calls for a vote in advance of a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota; but it does seem to me that under the circumstances and the conditions that confront us at this time the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, regardless of its merits, attributing to it all of the virtues for which he contends, is inopportune and ought to be withdrawn, or promptly defeated.

We are discussing a tax bill, not a tariff bill, and further efforts to convert it into a tariff bill should meet with no support. It is obvious that if demands are made and acceded to for additional tariffs on commodities, Congress will be in session for weeks and perhaps months. It is vital that a revenue bill be enacted at the earliest possible date. The financial situation demands prompt action by Congress, and we will be derelict in our duty if we consume days and weeks in considering demands for tariff increases.

If we are to break down the barriers and introduce into this bill amendments dealing with a multitude of products, we might just as well label it a tariff bill and abandon the objective of enacting a sound and proper revenue measure.

If a tariff bill was being considered, the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota would be germane and relevant and the appropriate committees of the House and Senate would have conducted hearings and obtained data bearing upon the matter. When the Smoot-Hawley bill was under consideration the question of tariff upon oils of various kinds was the subject of extensive hearings and produced prolonged debates both in the House and Senate. Tariff laws are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. They are subject to frequent changes. The tariff acts such as the Fordney-McCumber, Payne-Aldrich, McKinley, and Dingley laws served the purposes of the public for a limited time. The Hawley Act will soon be modified, and when measures are offered for the purpose of increasing or reducing rates the Senator's proposition can then be considered. Transitions occur economically and politically, and economic and industrial conditions of to-day will not be existent to-morrow. Tariff schedules that are applicable to-day may be inapplicable within a short time.

The Smoot-Hawley law is not a fixity. While it is a chain that binds and restricts, it will not indefinitely continue. The people will not complacently submit to tariff barriers, which are in part responsible for the economic depression now existing. There will be a revolt against them, and the stream of international trade will carry our products to all lands. There will be changes in the schedules of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill within the next few years. Why, then, enter upon the task of repealing and modifying provisions of that law at this hour, when a revenue bill must quickly be passed? Why now, within two years after the passage of a tariff bill that provoked discussion for a year and a half, inject tariff questions into this tax bill?

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that whether we are advocates of prohibitive tariffs or of moderate tariffs, we should pretermit the consideration of tariff questions until some later time.

Aside from the general considerations to which I have so imperfectly alluded, it seems to me unfair to single out, as this amendment does, the Philippine Islands, for approximately 95 per cent of the commodities against which the amendment is aimed comes from the Philippine Islands. Why aim at them and some of their products?

The United States took them under its ægis against their will. We superimposed upon them, I was about to say by fire and sword, certainly by bayonet and cannon and military force, an alien rule. Are we to hold them as colonial possessions, denying to them the rights which should be accorded those who are under the flag of our country? Are we to conquer peoples in distant lands, and hold them for exploitation, for material gain? If they are under this flag they should not be treated as aliens, and subject to tariff laws that will embargo their products.

Mr. President, to me it is indefensible to hold alien peoples under the flag and deny to them the rights and privileges guaranteed by the Constitution. If they are to be held as colonies for exploitation, then we fail to understand the spirit of this Republic, and are strangers to the political concepts upon which this Nation rests.

Even Great Britain accords to her colonial possessions greater rights than many Americans are willing to concede to the conquered Filipino race. Rome gave to her conquered provinces liberal government, I was about to say independence, certainly local self-government, autonomy in the highest degree, and many of the citizens of her provinces were known as Roman citizens.

The Apostle Paul claimed the right of a Roman citizen when arraigned before the provincial tribunal, and his case was referred to Rome for adjudication.

Are we to keep the Filipinos in a condition of vassalage? Are we to deny them rights which the Constitution gives to them? We forced upon them free trade, so far as the United States is concerned, against their will, and now, after they have adjusted their economic condition to the legislation thus forced upon them, the proposition is made that they shall be treated as aliens living upon alien soil, and be subject to such tariff restrictions as may be demanded by American citizens or selfish corporate or individual interests.

Some greedy Americans have gone to the Philippine Islands for the purpose of acquiring lands and developing an industrial condition, not for the benefit of the Filipinos, but for the benefit of American capitalists. I fear that there has been a measure of imperialism in the United States that has tainted our contacts with alien people. We superimposed upon Haiti a military rule. By force we changed her constitution, which forbade aliens from acquiring territory, because the Haitians knew that with their limited acreage, and with their rather large population, if foreigners acquired territory there, the people of Haiti would become vassals and peons.

Mr. President, our duty with respect to the Filipinos is plain. Instead of passing tariff laws to increase their burdens, to shut out their products from our land, if we are to legislate at all, let us give them their freedom. They covet it. They have been demanding it for years, and they will never be satisfied until they are completely emancipated from the authority and control of the United States. The statement is often made that the Filipinos are guilty of ingratitude because they demand their freedom and their right to a government of their own choice. Some Americans insist that the Filipinos should accept without complaint whatever form of government may be imposed upon them by the United States; that they should have no aspirations for independence, but should be content to remain indefinitely under our flag, but without the Constitution, and subject to the uncontrolled will of Congress.

Mr. President, the Filipinos won their liberty from Spain and set up a government republican in form. Admiral Dewey stated that they were more competent to govern themselves and to maintain an independent government than were the people of Cuba. Why should the aspirations of the Filipinos be stifled and impediments thrown in their way of achieving that liberty which brave and heroic men and women everywhere desire to enjoy? Of course, it is no easy task to set up and maintain in the conditions now prevailing in the world an independent government, but the right of self-determination is an established doctrine and accepted by liberal-minded people throughout the world. Latin-America has many states whose area is less and whose population is smaller than that of the Philippine Islands. We do not contend that the people of Costa Rica or San Salvador or Panama or other Latin American states, because of the lack of resources or the limited number of their inhabitants, should be denied the right to govern themselves. The love of independence and of liberty is inherent in man. The Filipinos have given many evidences of their virile qualities; of their courage and of their capacity to work out their own salvation politically and economically. It is true that they will experience vicissitudes and difficulties in establishing and maintaining an independent government. The same can be said of most governments that have been established. Small states with few inhabitants have oftentimes risen to great heights of power and glory. Their very weakness has often been a source of strength.

Nations do not spring full-panoplied from the brow of some puissant Jove; they are subject to evolutionary laws which find expression in the political and economic lives of communities and nations. The law of social evolution, as Spencer has shown, finds application in society and in states.

The Philippine Islands possess great natural resources and a homogeneous people, united in their desire for independence and certain of their ability to organize and maintain a stable and progressive government—one that will take its place among the advanced and progressive nations of the earth. Perhaps there is no true basis of comparison between the American colonists and the establishment of this Republic, and the Filipinos and their aspirations for liberty. Nevertheless there may be some analogies that may not be overlooked. The American colonists in the main were of English descent; they carried with them to the new world the customs and religion and culture and laws of Great Britain. However, they were not satisfied to remain colonies under the control of those to whom they were bound by so many ties. Need we wonder that an alien race, differing from us in language, culture, and laws, should desire to be free from the domination of this Nation.

Can we criticize the Filipinos for desiring independence, desiring to have their own flag, which they may salute as we salute the Stars and Stripes of this Republic?

Mr. President, it were better to have a free and independent nation there under their own flag, working out their own destiny, than to have the irritating conditions which exist and will continue to exist so long as the Filipinos are under the domination of the United States.

Why not give them their independence? Passing measures such as suggested by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] will arouse indignation, ill will, and be provocative of unrest and disturbing currents. It will arouse in the hearts of the Filipinos a determination to continue the contest until their aspirations for independence shall have been realized.

If we want to deal with this question of tariffs, we can do it in a short way. Give the Filipinos their independence, pass a measure that has been pending from the beginning of this Congress, and textually the same measure was introduced in preceding Congresses. Under this measure within three years they will be wholly independent. They will have ample opportunity to hold a convention, and to adopt a constitution republican in form, as it will be. They will have ample opportunity to select officers of their own choice, and, after that has been done, and the facts certified to the President of the United States that they have a republican form of Government and officers selected pursuant to their constitution, then the President by proclamation will declare that they are free and independent, and will notify other nations of that fact. Under this plan the Filipino Republic will embark upon the international sea competent, I believe, to battle with the elements, and to win its way as other nations and other peoples have won their way, from a lowly condition in the economic and political field of life to the summit of great achievement.

When the Philippine Islands are praying for independence, when they are looking for some legislation favorable to their aspirations, let us not give them a stone instead of bread. Let us indicate to them that we desire their happiness and their welfare, and that we will at the earliest possible moment give to them their independence and bid them Godspeed in the long and perhaps hard race before them.

If, however, we are to vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, then we should adopt the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri, and exclude from the operations of the amendment the products of the Philippine Islands. But my friend from Minnesota must know that he would have a Pyrrhic victory. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri shall be adopted, the Senator from Minnesota will have the mere shell; he will not have the substance of what he seeks to hold within his grasp.

Mr. President, let us do justice to the Filipinos. Let us vote down this amendment, and at the same time indirectly declare that we are for the independence of the Filipinos, that we will deal justly by them, that we will withdraw the sovereignty of the United States, and aid them in their great adventure upon the international sea.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am going to take just enough time to read a very short editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of May 24, 1932, entitled "Senatorial Gamblers." The editorial is as follows:

The fact that the emergency revenue measure is no place for tariff legislation becomes more apparent every day. The logrolling coalition of Senators of both parties which in the Finance Committee was able to write embargoes on coal, oil, copper, and lumber into the tax bill has succeeded in winning the support of the Chamber to their proposals—but at what a price! The tax bill, designed for the sole purpose of balancing the Budget—a vital necessity in the present emergency—becomes now the sport of sectional and group interests and subject to heaven knows what amendments and delays. Every harpy on the national roster is poised above this essential legislation ready to claim its share of the privileges dispensed. Instead of a tax measure we have a pork barrel; instead of prompt action to balance the Budget, a country languishing for this imperative corrective must sit by in misery while its parochial representatives fight over the national carcass.

For it is a carcass, or will be unless our Senators come to their senses and renounce this effort to destroy the whole for the sake of the parts. The protagonists of the present tariff schedules in the tax bill have a notion that they can confine its special favors to those already incorporated and put the bill over before the end of the fiscal year. Possibly they are right, but we believe that they have endangered the whole reconstruction program, that they have invited a legislative quarrel not unlikely to last all summer and that their only patriotic course is to withdraw their extraneous riders and pass the tax bill as a tax bill.

The situation calls for honest legislators, not gamblers for political advantage at the risk of the country's future.

Mr. President, this paper, which we all know to be a stanch and stalwart Republican journal, has risen above taking partisan advantage at this time. Perhaps it might be conceded, if these tariff items were put into a tariff bill, that many of them would receive the support of the Herald Tribune; but the Herald Tribune has risen above mere partisan considerations, and, in this splendid editorial, which so clearly sets forth the facts, calls upon those who have the responsibility for this legislation to withdraw the tariff items and pass a tax bill. I tender this editorial with a great deal of pleasure at its nonpartisan vein.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I want to repeat what I said this morning, that I agree with the sentiment that has been expressed as to the Filipinos and Filipino freedom. I am for the freedom of the Philippines. I was for it before we ever went into the Philippines.

Filipino freedom, however, has nothing to do with the pending measure. Permitting capital—European and American—to exploit the farmers for another 15 years is at stake here, permitting American and European capital invested in the Philippines to exploit the farmers of the United States through the privileges capital enjoys by having the products raised in the Philippines brought in here and sold in competition with butter.

That is what is at stake here. That is the issue. This is not going to reduce the imports from the Philippine Islands. The Philippine Islands will still have a monopoly of the coconut oil imported into the United States. That oil will come here in as large quantities as before. The only difference it will make will be that the soap interests will have to pay a higher price than they are now paying. It has been pointed out that they are paying 3½ cents now for the same material for which they used to pay 17 cents, and yet they charge the same price for soap now as when the raw materials were selling at 17 cents a pound.

Mr. President, I understand the vote will first come on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], whose amendment proposes to take out of my amendment all of its effects on the Philippine Islands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BARBOUR. On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I do not know how he would vote if present. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on account of illness.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] are detained on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] are necessarily out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—56

Ashurst	Couzens	Kendrick	Reed

So Mr. HAWES's amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment proposed by Mr. SHIPSTEAD was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota as amended.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask for some information. All reference to the Philippines is now eliminated from the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. May I ask just what amount of revenue this tax will bring in now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Minnesota give his attention?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The total amount of revenue estimated, when the provision relating to the Philippines was in the amendment, was about $25,000,000. It is thought that about $11,000,000 was coming from coconut oil, which was the main income from the Philippines. What is left is something that I can not actually estimate.

Mr. BORAH. I think elimination of the Philippines was a wise thing; but, in my opinion, it eliminated the amendment. I do not think there is anything now left of it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for a moment. It is perfectly apparent that we are in the midst of a tariff fight; we have forgotten all about the revenue bill. There are any number of amendments still pending. One of the Senators from North Dakota told me he would feel compelled to offer an amendment increasing the duty on flax. Another Senator has just told me that since we have put the four tariff items in the bill he has about a bushel basket full of telegrams asking for all kinds of protection. I am wondering now whether the Senator from Utah, in the interest of speed, as chairman of the committee charged with the responsibility of passing this purely revenue bill will not rise and ask his colleagues on both sides of the aisle to throw out all these tariff items, so that we on this side of the aisle may give the President the kind of support which we all know he wants at this time. I hope——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not finished. I hope the Senator from Utah will realize that day after day and day after day is being wasted in consideration of purely tariff matters, having no relation whatsoever to revenue-raising purposes. Now that other tariff items have been put in the bill numerous Senators are in their offices preparing amendments. This procedure may continue, as the Herald Tribune has said, away into the heat of summer. I will be glad to follow the Senator from Utah if he will just rise and call upon all of us to show our patriotism and to cast aside all local considerations and to permit the majority of the Democrats on this side of the aisle to vote for speed and to get this measure through. Obviously, the way to do that, in my humble judgment, is to have all these controversial tariff matters out of the bill. May I not ask the Senator from Utah if he is not now ready to make such an appeal to this body?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I object to the question; I object to the answer. It would consume time unnecessarily, and I hope the Senator from Utah will not waste a minute in such a proceeding. I object to an answer.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Arizona as to just what particular part of the answer he objects?

Mr. ASHURST. I object to time being consumed in making any answer. I wish to save all these apologies for this measure. Why all these threats? Offer your amendments, but do not threaten, wasting the time of the public. The newspapers are correct in scandalizing Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] as amended.

Mr. ASHURST. Question! Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I, of course, am always willing to listen in the best of good humor to the splendid speeches of my friend from Arizona; but I was hoping that he would at least not assume to exercise the prerogatives of the Senator from Utah. I was asking a question, in the best of faith, and hoping the Senator from Utah would at least disclose his position on the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARBOUR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] are detained on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] are necessarily out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 48, as follows:

So Mr. SHIPSTEAD's amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORBECK. Would it be in order at this time to offer an amendment to the butter schedule of the tariff act to come in on page 245 of the pending bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has been recognized to offer an amendment. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota probably could be offered later if not now. On what page does the Senator desire the amendment to come in?

Mr. NORBECK. On page 245, between lines 10 and 11. I ask that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD at this point. It provides a tax of 8 cents on imports of butter in addition to the present 14 cents per pound duty on butter, oleomargarine, and other substitutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the usual form, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. NORBECK is as follows:

On page 245, between lines 10 and 11, insert the following new paragraph:

"(9) Butter, 8 cents per pound; oleomargarine and other butter substitutes, 8 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk. I assume that all Senators are familiar with it. I have changed it from the form in which it is printed by striking out the first two lines because of the action which was taken last night when the committee amendment in regard to automobile trucks was disagreed to and the rate was reduced to 2 per cent, thereby reducing the revenue-producing qualities of the bill by about $2,000,000.

Mr. President, I will not ask to have the amendment read, as I think every Senator knows what is in it, but I will ask that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BINGHAM is as follows:

On page 247, line 4, strike out "4 per cent" and insert "2 per cent."

On page 247, line 9, strike out "2 per cent" and insert "1 per cent."

On page 250, strike out all of section 603, "Tax on radio receiving sets, etc."

On page 264, line 19, strike out the balance of the page and all of pages 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, and 271, through line 7.

On page 286, line 1, after "money," insert "in the amount of $5 or more."

On page 310, strike out, in lines 7 and 8, "Postal rates" and insert "Tax on beer."

Commencing on line 9, strike out the balance of the section and insert the following:

"The national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is amended in the following respects:

"(a) By striking out the words 'one-half of 1 per cent or more' wherever they appear in such act, and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'more than 2.75 per cent by weight.'

"(b) By striking out the words 'less than one-half of 1 per cent' wherever they appear in such act, and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'not more than 2.75 per cent by weight.'

"(c) By striking out the words 'more than one-half of 1 per cent' wherever they appear in such act, and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'more than 2.75 per cent by weight.'

"(d) By striking out the words 'below such one-half of 1 per cent' wherever they appear in such act, and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'to 2.75 per cent by weight or less.'

"(e) By striking out the words 'and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter' where they appear in section 1 of Title II of such act, and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'and is otherwise denominated than as ale.'

"SEC. 2. Any offense in violation of, or any right, obligation, or penalty, or any seizure or forfeiture based upon any provision of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, or upon any regulation or permit issued thereunder, committed, accruing, made, or incurred prior to the time this act takes effect, may be prosecuted or enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. 3. All permits issued under the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, before this act takes effect shall be valid with respect to intoxicating liquor as hereinbefore defined in this act, to the same extent as such permits are at the time this act takes effect valid with respect to intoxicating liquor as defined by law prior to the enactment of this act.

"SEC. 4. Title II of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"'SEC. 40. All fermented liquors brewed or manufactured, and taxable under the provisions of section 608 of the revenue act of 1918, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, shall be packed in cases of pint bottles of 16 fluid ounces content, such cases to contain one dozen, two dozen, or four dozen such bottles each. Each case and individual bottle shall be marked, branded, and labeled in such manner as the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury shall jointly by regulations prescribe, and all sales by brewers and dealers in fermented liquors shall be in the original package or case so marked, branded, or labeled. Such fermented liquors may be removed from such package or case for use in any public place only by legitimate hotels and restaurants and for the sole purpose of serving such liquors in the dining rooms of such establishments in the pint bottle with meals.'"

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to explain that the amendment is purely a revenue-producing measure. It strikes out from the bill taxes amounting to about $369,000,000 in addition to the $2,000,000 which were taken off the bill last night.

In the first item, that relative to automobiles, it reduces the tax as proposed by the committee by 50 per cent, thereby saving the consumer $28,000,000. In the case of automobile parts it reduces the tax proposed by the committee 50 per cent, thereby saving about $1,000,000. In the case of the tax on radio receiving sets and phonographs it strikes the tax out entirely, thereby relieving the consumer to the extent of $11,000,000. It strikes out entirely the tax on telegrams and telephones, thereby taking $24,000,000 off the shoulders of the taxpayers.

Against the tax on amusements there has been very great protest from all parts of the country since the Senate committee agreed to tax all admissions over 10 cents, a tax which will probably put out of business a great many, if not half, of the smaller moving-picture houses of the country. The amendment which I propose strikes out the tax on amusements entirely, thereby saving for the taxpayers $110,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BINGHAM. Just a moment, until I finish my statement as to the amounts involved, and then I will be glad to yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

As to the tax on bank checks, in accordance with the statement made to the committee that in the Western States, particularly in the dairy States, an enormous number of checks are issued to dairymen and farmers bringing in small amounts of produce who would be benefited if there were no tax on small checks, the amendment limits the tax on checks to those of $5 or more, thereby saving to the taxpayer $35,000,000.

Finally, in regard to the increase on postal rates, which in this bill is 50 per cent over the present rate, and which will cost some of our industrial concerns, which are staggering under a heavy load to-day, many hundreds of thousands of dollars, in addition to costing everyone who sends a letter through the mail an additional 50 per cent, the amendment strikes out the increase in first-class postage and in second-class postage, thereby taking $160,000,000 off the shoulders of the taxpayer.

The $371,000,000 loss may be easily met by adopting this amendment, which provides that the national prohibition act be amended by striking out the words "one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they occur and inserting the words "2.75 per cent by weight."

Mr. President, while some doubt has been expressed as to the intoxicating quality of 4 per cent beer, there has practically never been any contention on the part of physiologists or toxicologists that beer with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight is intoxicating within the meaning of the Constitution.

I have been advocating the legalization of beer of an alcoholic content of 4 per cent by volume, which is equivalent to 3.2 per cent by weight, because such beer is more palatable and, according to the testimony of many physiologists, is not intoxicating. In order to meet the objections of those who are in doubt on this matter, however, I have reduced the proposed alcoholic content of the beer legalized by this amendment by forty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Two and seventy-five one-hundredths per cent beer by weight has less than one-half of 1 per cent less alcohol than so-called 4 per cent beer, although it sounds as though it had one and one-quarter per cent less alcohol.

There is abundant evidence in the records brought to the attention of the Supreme Court that 2.75 beer is not intoxicating. A great many affidavits from leading physicians all over the United States were presented to the Supreme Court in an effort to prove to that body that when the Congress passed the Volstead Act, making one-half of 1 per cent the lower limit of an intoxicating beverage, the Congress was not acting within its constitutional authority. The Supreme Court decided that it was so acting but did not pass at all on the question of whether 2.75 per cent beer was intoxicating or was not intoxicating.

The American Federation of Labor has repeatedly gone on record in favor of legalizing beer of this alcoholic content, and so have many other organizations.

I am introducing this measure at this time because of its revenue-producing character. It was repeatedly stated on the floor of the House day before yesterday and at other times that it would raise $500,000,000 of revenue; but the more conservative estimates place the revenue at about $375,000,000. Consequently, in my amendment I have used this more conservative revenue-producing quality to enable us to avoid imposing a number of taxes which will be felt by a large number of people.

In the first place, the amendment reduces the proposed tax on automobiles by 50 per cent.

In the second place, it eliminates entirely the taxes on radios and phonographs.

In the third place, it eliminates entirely the tax on telegrams and telephones.

In the fourth place, it eliminates the tax on admissions.

In the fifth place, it eliminates the new postage rates.

In the sixth place, it eliminates the stamp tax on small checks.

There is some doubt as to whether the bill would raise the amounts estimated for these various items, since it is believed by some of those who are interested in the automobile industry and some of those interested in the moving-picture industry that it would not raise what the Finance Committee expects to secure from it. However, is it worth while to levy taxes of nearly $375,000,000 on legitimate, struggling business and to permit illegitimate business to go virtually tax free?

Here is a source of revenue which is unquestionably constitutional, which no one would object to paying, which would enormously reduce the illegitimate profits of speakeasies and beer racketeers, and, in addition, would promote economic recovery as well as temperance and sobriety.

There is abundant testimony to the effect that legalizing beer would put thousands of men immediately to work, would use millions of bushels of grain and tons of coal, and would start new activity in many lines of business.

I hold in my hand an article from the New York World-Telegram of Wednesday, April 20, in which Mr. Jacob Ruppert says that when he is permitted to make and sell old-fashioned beer he will immediately hang out a sign, "Wanted, 600 to 1,000 men for permanent jobs," and he is ready to spend $5,000,000 for improvements, and that means thousands more jobs. That is only one instance of what it will do.

Furthermore, there is abundant testimony to the effect that it would encourage temperance and sobriety and tend to discourage the use of hard liquor. In support of that claim I merely refer to the fact that in the two great beer-drinking and beer-producing cities in this country, St. Louis and Milwaukee, where what was considered the best American beer was made, the number of persons arrested for intoxication during the past year was 300 per cent greater than it was during the days before prohibition, when the people in those cities could get all the good beer they wanted. Those breweries to-day are making nothing but near beer.

In conclusion let me call attention to the fact that Great Britain for the past few years has had a tax of $25 a barrel on beer. The tax on our books is $6 a barrel. The barrels are not quite the same size. The tax on our books to-day, which could be collected if this amendment should pass, amounts to 2 cents on an ordinary pint bottle of beer. The tax which Great Britain has collected for the past 10 years amounts to 9 cents on a pint of beer; and an enormous amount of revenue has been raised by Great Britain for that purpose, which has helped her to balance her budget.

Furthermore, Mr. President, it is significant that drunkenness in the British Isles has decreased steadily; and during the past year, according to the report of the Royal Commission, there were fewer persons arrested for intoxication in all of England and Wales, where there are more than 40,000,000 people, than in the single city of Philadelphia alone under prohibition. There are only about 3,000,000 people in Philadelphia; and yet there were more persons arrested for drunkenness in Philadelphia last year, after 12 years of prohibition, than in all of England and Wales, that have not had prohibition.

Drunkenness in the city of London has dropped nearly 50 per cent in the last 12 years, while in the city of Washington under prohibition it has almost doubled. In the meantime, in this country intoxication has been steadily increasing throughout all the larger cities, including some 550 cities and towns on which we have estimates.

In 1929 the arrests for intoxication throughout the United States were greater than before prohibition was adopted.

I mention those facts merely to show that prohibition does not prohibit; that we have not any great reduction in intoxication; and it is the belief of many college presidents, deans, and teachers in schools and colleges that legalizing beer would promote temperance and sobriety in the communities of young people over whom they have charge.

My amendment provides that this 2.75 beer can be sold only in pint bottles for use in homes or in hotels and restaurants. In this way the return to the old-fashioned saloon, so feared by many people, is prevented, and the prosperity of the present speak-easy is attacked.

This is essentially a revenue-producing measure; but it will also promote business and discourage the bootlegger and the racketeer, whose ill-gotten gains are to-day, as everyone knows, used to promote some of the most hideous crimes in all history.

In view of the necessity for saving time I forbear from yielding to the temptation to discuss the economic merits of this project, to show how it would produce a market for millions of bushels of grain and millions of tons of coal, in addition to employment for hundreds of thousands of people now out of employment, because after all this bill is not a measure tending to increase business. On the other hand, it will tend to diminish business. Here, however, is a revenue-producing item in the bill that will not only raise $375,000,000 during the coming year, and do it easily and at the expense of illegitimate business, but it will actually promote industry and promote employment, and tend to restore prosperity and promote temperance and sobriety.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. For my information, can the Senator tell me in how many States of the Union it would be impossible for this proposal to operate because of State inhibitions, either statutory or constitutional?

Mr. BINGHAM. The estimates of the revenue are based on the fact that only in 15 States could the beer legally be sold.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. Will he yield for that purpose?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator mentioned approvingly the wonders accomplished by a beer tax in Great Britain. I suppose he means in England, Scotland, and Wales. Notwithstanding all of the revenue that they have been enabled to derive from a tax on beer in a beer-drinking country, the fact remains, if I am correctly informed, that the English income tax on an income of $5,000 for a married man with no dependents is $703 annually, while here it is something less than $40.

There has been no proposal that I know of made on the floor of the Senate, or of the House at the other end of the Capitol, that in balancing the Budget it would ever be necessary to levy an income tax of anything like $703 on a $5,000 income. I am wondering why this tax on beer has not worked better in England, which, according to the Senator, is the one place he uses as an example and illustration.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, England is under a far heavier debt than we are.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How much?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have not the figures; but everyone knows that the per capita debt of England is several times the per capita debt of the United States. Furthermore, the amount of revenue derived from this very heavy tax of 9 cents a pint on beer, while it has reduced the amount of beer consumed to an appreciable extent, and thereby reduced their revenue, still produces in that country a revenue equivalent to something like $250,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is 9 cents a pint over there, and I understand that the Senator would make it 3 cents a pint here.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken. The present law in this country, passed in 1918, I think, puts a tax of $6 a barrel, equivalent to 2 cents a pint, on beer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. A tax of 2 cents a pint to raise $600,000,000, then, would require that $3,000,000,000 be spent for beer annually. I think the $3,000,000,000 ought to be spent for bread.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no! How does the Senator work that out? Will the Senator explain?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. At the rate of 2 cents a pint, in order to raise $600,000,000——

Mr. BINGHAM. Who is proposing to raise $600,000,000?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood that some of the suggestions made were that $600,000,000 might be raised.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no; not even the wildest enthusiasts have ever imagined for a moment that 2.75 per cent beer could produce $600,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How much would it produce, Mr. President?

Mr. BINGHAM. I stated that it was conservatively estimated that it would produce about $375,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That would mean about two-thirds of the $3,000,000,000 suggested, and $2,000,000,000 spent for beer in times like these——

Mr. BINGHAM. What does the Senator believe to be the price of beer per bottle?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand it to be 10 cents a pint, and with a tax of 2 cents a pint—is not that about what it would be, 2 cents a pint in the way of tax? If the tax is to be 2 cents a pint on beer sold at 10 cents a pint, and we are to raise $375,000,000 annually, it would be necessary to spend approximately $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the best evidence the committee which took the evidence on this was able to get was that at the present time there is a very large amount of beer being made, selling at anywhere from 25 to 35 cents a bottle, on which the Government does not receive anything. All the profits go into the pockets of the beer racketeers, like Capone and others, who have been carrying on their nefarious business with the enormous profits they have made out of that illegitimate business. All I am proposing is that some of the profits be taken out of the illegitimate business and turned into the Government revenue through a legitimate business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The point I make is that even in England, which the Senator cites approvingly as a great beer-drinking nation, where they derive so much revenue from a tax on beer, the fact still remains that the income tax is $703 annually on an income of $5,000, while in this country it is not proposed to make it over $50 or $60, even in the bill we have before us.

Mr. BINGHAM. The fact also remains that in England and Wales combined there were only 51,000 convictions for drunkenness in the year 1929, while in this country in the year 1929, in only 569 places, there were 759,807 arrests for drunkenness, or more than fifteen times as many; and I trust the Senator is sufficiently interested in temperance and in promoting sobriety to agree that England is better off than we are in the matter of drunkenness.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not agree with the figures so frequently cited by—shall I say the apologists for the liquor traffic? I do not agree with the figure just now cited.

I would like to mention before I take my seat, however, the other beer-drinking country, Germany, where, I understand from a traveler recently returned from that country, it has been necessary, notwithstanding the beer tax, which is as high as they can make it, to impose a tax on gasoline of 32 cents a gallon.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much is the beer tax in Germany?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not know what the beer tax is, but the tax on gasoline there is 32 cents a gallon. In this country the highest tax on gasoline is, I think, in Florida, where it is 7 cents a gallon. So evidently things are not so bad in this country from a revenue standpoint as in either England or Germany, and they have beer and can tax that beer, and can make the tax as high as they choose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, that may be quite true, but the fact remains that if we will adopt this perfectly constitutional method, we can save the American taxpayer one-half of the proposed tax on automobiles, one-half of the proposed tax on motor parts and accessories, all of the new tax on postage, all of the new tax on radios and phonographs, all of the new tax on telephones and telegraphs, and all of the new tax on admissions to theaters.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the merits of the contention of those who are insisting upon this amendment, but I do desire to say that I think they are a little overenthusiastic about what it would do. I think their zeal has outrun the facts.

It is contended, or has been contended from time to time in the discussion of the beer question, that among other things a tax on beer would settle the farm question, that it would practically settle the unemployment question, that it would make simple and satisfactory a revenue bill, and that it would bring contentment and happiness where there are now despair and distress.

I thought I remembered, when I read the statements with reference to agriculture, about a hearing which took place in 1917. At that time, it will be remembered, we had a population of 102,000,000 people in the United States. Now we have a population of about 124,000,000. So we can get a reasonable comparison.

Turning to the hearings which were had with reference to the production and conservation of food supplies in May, 1917, I read a few lines from the testimony of Mr. Pabst; and nobody in the discussion of beer will question the authority of Mr. Pabst on the question of beer. Pabst is to the beer world what Shakespeare is to the world of poetry. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator ought to know.

Mr. BORAH. I do know, from reading. It will be remembered that Mr. Pabst was being asked whether or not they were consuming food products for the manufacture of beer when it ought to be used for food. He said:

> The two questions which are now uppermost are revenue and food conservation.
> The output of beer for the year ending June 30, 1916, was 58,633,624 barrels. At the present rate of $1.50 per barrel the Government received a revenue of $87,994,500.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator realizes that at present the rate is $6 a barrel.

Mr. BORAH. I realize that, but I am not willing for my Government to do business with people like those with whom Capone does business.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not the Senator willing for the Government to take some steps to help put Capone out of business?

Mr. BORAH. We have done that. He is in the penitentiary.

Mr. BINGHAM. Temporarily.

Mr. BORAH. I think he will be there until after the Republican convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. Pabst continued:

Allowing for the shrinkage due to States that have gone "dry," the Internal Revenue Department estimates the sales of beer for the next fiscal year at 50,000,000 barrels.

This is the point to which I directed the able Senator's attention, not in confutation of his argument so much as to suggest that he has been overenthusiastic.

The area of land under cultivation to barley was in 1915, according to the official figures of the Agricultural Department, eactly 0.39 of 1 per cent of the total area of agricultural land in the United States. The area which is needed for the brewers' requirements is 0.068 per cent, or a little less than 0.07 of 1 per cent of the total area of our agricultural land.

That is what Mr. Pabst said. He said further:

The total number of bushels of grain used is 70,505,488; returned to the farm as a dairy food, 35 per cent, 24,676,920 bushels. Net number of bushels of grain used in the manufacture of beer, 45,828,568, which is less than three-quarters of 1 per cent of the total grain crop of 1916, which was 4,703,429,000 bushels. The grain crop of 1915 was 5,762,575,000 bushels. The total revenue from the beer tax in 1916 was $87,950,000, which is equal to $1.90 per bushel of the grain used.

Senator GRONNA. The percentage of grain used in the brewing business, according to your figures, would be almost negligible. * * *

Mr. PABST. Yes.

There were 102,000,000 people in the United States then. There are now 124,000,000. So while it might help the farmer, I again say that I think those who are advocating this matter have been overzealous in their statement of the facts. Just the spirit of the crusader, that is all—no intention to mislead.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, did the Senator hear me make any overstatement in regard to the number of bushels it would help consume? I wonder what overstatement I made.

Mr. BORAH. It has been stated here repeatedly, by the Senator or by his coadjutor, that it would practically bring prosperity to the American farm.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I never heard anybody say that. All I have heard them say is that it might give an additional market for 100,000,000 bushels of grain, which would help 100,000 farmers. I did not use that argument to-day.

Mr. BORAH. No; not to-day; but my memory goes back.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is very kind.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator is going to confine his argument to the fact that it "might" do so and so, I shall not undertake to discuss the matter further. I understood that we had an assurance that it was to return prosperity to the farm.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator exaggerates just as much in that statement as some of his opponents have been exaggerating. So far as the number of barrels consumed is concerned, the Senator quoted an estimate that it would be 50,000,000 in 1917. Actually it was 60,817,000, and it is on that basis, using the rate of $6 a barrel, which is the present rate, that one arrives at $360,000,000 for the population we had in 1917. A conservative estimate would give $375,000,000 of revenue at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator may be right about the sixty million, but I insist on accepting Mr. Pabst's figures, because I know Mr. Pabst knew more about it than the Senator can possibly know.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not quarreling with the Senator's figures, but merely with his statement that we had overestimated the amount of revenue. The estimate is based on figures of beer which was sold in the barrel in 1917, namely, 60,817,000 barrels.

Mr. BORAH. I will come to the revenue question in a moment. I am now discussing the return of prosperity to the farm.

In 1905, that year being the peak year in the consumption of beer, there were 5,096,000 acres in barley, and we raised 136,651,000 bushels.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, whom was the Senator quoting when he said that 1905 was the peak year in the production of beer? In 1905 there were consumed only 49,000,000 barrels. That was one of the low years. Whereas in 1916 there were consumed 58,000,000 barrels, and, as has already been stated, in 1917 there were consumed 60,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. I will take the 1916 figures. Will the Senator give me the acreage in barley that year?

Mr. BINGHAM. I was discussing barrels of beer.

Mr. BORAH. I am discussing acreage.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not know the Senator was proposing to put a tax on acres of land.

Mr. BORAH. We will take the Senator's figures for 1916. In 1927, after we had had prohibition for some time, we had an acreage of 9,492,000 and we raised 265,577,000 bushels. The farmer got 67.8 cents a bushel, or $180,127,000. That is far more than he ever got in the balmy days of beer. Certainly prohibition did not hurt the farmer's prosperity with reference to barley. Never has he raised so much barley or secured better prices.

The Agricultural Department in 1909 declared that the farm value that year for barley was $88,000,000, while in 1927 it was $180,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. May I observe that according to my information, in Canada, where liquor is licensed, barley has been selling in the past year at 8 cents a bushel? It was never lower than 12 cents a bushel during the past year in this country. That was low enough, but it never went lower than 12 cents a bushel, while in Canada, where beer flourishes legally and under license, it sold at 8 cents a bushel.

Mr. BORAH. I thought I heard the Senator from Connecticut say to-day—at least I have heard him say previously—that the selling of beer would have a tendency to prevent the use of hard liquor. That is one of the arguments put forth, especially by those deeply interested in temperance. They are not so much for beer, but they want it in the cause of temperance to stop the drinking of hard liquor.

Mr. BINGHAM. What I have said in the past and the testimony given before the committee by various teachers in schools and colleges was that the legalization of beer would, in their opinion, tend to promote sobriety among young people and among college students. We have an abundance of testimony from deans and professors that since it has been impossible to secure good beer, college students have taken to drinking hard liquor, when it was not previously their custom to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I have great respect for professors on some subjects, but I doubt very much whether they are familiar with the subject of the transfer of the appetite from beer to hard liquor. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator claim he is a better authority on that subject than the deans of some of the colleges?

Mr. BORAH. No; but I am going to give the Senator an authority which he will not dispute.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will admit that when deans of colleges and those in charge of the education of youth make statements of that kind they have no other object in view than to attempt to produce better conditions for the students under their care.

Mr. BORAH. I do not question their motive at all. I question their taste.

The British Columbia liquor board, in its official report, said that "since the opening of the beer parlors the sales of hard liquors have increased 50 per cent."

Mr. BINGHAM. It must have been very poor beer.

Mr. BORAH. Possibly so; but I think it was better than the Senator will be able to get under this amendment. [Laughter.]

The Quebec Liquor Commission said that "the sales of hard spirits increased 32,275 gallons in one year."

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator mean to imply that is all consumed in Canada?

Mr. BORAH. Some of it might have gotten to Connecticut. I do not know about that.

The Saskatchewan liquor board said that the "sales of hard liquor increased 33 per cent in the last two years."

The Montreal Star said, "Drunkenness among women increased 53 per cent," and the Montreal Star is an advocate of the present system in Canada. The police commissioner stated, "If all the drunks were arrested there would soon be no room for them in the jails of Canada."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. The Senator from Idaho cited Montreal. In Quebec wine and beer are sold in public places. Hard liquors are sold under government control. When I was last in Canada I was informed there were four places in Quebec where the government dispenses liquor and that one is entitled to get one quart of liquor a week, but that if he worked it right he can get four quarts of liquor. Yet they have saloons or public places selling wine and beer.

Mr. BORAH. The Saskatchewan liquor board says that "bootlegging increased 111 per cent in the first year." The British Columbia liquor board said, "As much liquor is sold by bootleggers as is sold in the government stores."

Mr. BINGHAM. Are those figures the Senator is citing in opposition to the teachers of youth in this country?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, indeed. I have not the awe for these teachers that the Senator has, but I have great respect for them.

Sir Hugh MacDonald, speaking of the Canadian situation, said:

> There is just as much unlawful drinking under the Government control act as under prohibition. The present law was in the very nature of things difficult of enforcement. It is far less difficult to secure convictions under prohibition than under Government control.

I might read further, but I shall not do so.

The Senator from Connecticut spoke about England and the way England conducts her liquor business. It is true that England has a revenue system with reference to intoxicating liquors. It is true that the amount of revenue raised is considerable and the tax is very heavy. It is having its effect in England. The best thought of England is to the effect that they must modify the tax or they will pauperize a very large portion of the working class of that country aside from those who are already unemployed. Let me read an article from the Manchester Guardian, which gives a vivid picture of the workingmen under the revenue system in Great Britain:

> Bermondsey is a borough of 114,000 people. The annual drink bill for this district for 1925 was £1,355,000, 85 per cent of which was for beer and the rest for wines and spirits.

There we have a perfect presentation of a perfect beer example. Here we have an illustration of the happy and prosperous community where they have beer and a heavy revenue tax.

> The annual drink bill for Bermondsey for 1925 was £1,355,000, 85 per cent of which was for beer and the rest for wine and spirits. Along with this fact we may note that it has the highest unemployment rate of any district in London, one in seven of the population being in receipt of relief. Wages are low, and the average wage of the fully employed man is £2 16s. 4d. Doctor Salter calculated that if each married man spent 5s. a week on drink and allowed his wife to spend half a crown, then, without making any allowance for abstainers, the drink bill would not exceed £557,000, less than two-fifths of the actual amount. For men and women to spent 7s. 6d. out of a weekly income of less than £3 on beer would be bad enough. What shall we say when, without allowing for abstainers, two and a half times that amount is deducted weekly from what is available for the nourishment and care of the children? The same point is brought into clear view when we note that though nearly a third of the population are children under 12 years of age, more than seven times as much was spent on strong drink as on milk. Indeed, the amount spent on alcoholic drink was nearly £200,000 more than the total amount spent on bread, milk, house rent, and rates.
> Now, I know that many people will say that it is poverty which is the cause of drunkenness and not drunkenness that is the cause of poverty. The statement is neither true nor false. The two causes are interwoven so that it is impossible to separate them. In life as many people have to live it in such places as Bermondsey there is little joy, and drunkenness is, to quote the old familiar saying, often welcomed as "the shortest way out." But that is no excuse for such wanton waste of human lives, of decency, of money, and of everything. There are plenty of men, and not only in Bermondsey, for whom life consists of nothing but work, to earn money, and beer on which to spend it. I was rereading William De Morgan's novel Joseph Vance the other day. He speaks of such men as "beer maggots," and says that they come to be little better than animate beer as a maggot in a cheese is little but animate cheese. The saying, if revolting, is perfectly true. It may ease the consciences of people who simply desire to banish an unpleasant subject from their minds to go on repeating that there is little drunkenness to-day and that the fight against this national enemy has been fought and won. But it is not true.

I think the Manchester Guardian, a great paper, ought to be a reliable witness with reference to these matters in England. It is a fearful, a revolting picture.

Mr. President, I have risen, as I have said, simply to state that it seems to me the advocates of the beer amendment are overstating the case. It will not accomplish what the Senator from Connecticut thinks it will accomplish.

If you collect five hundred million or four hundred million or three hundred and fifty million in the way of revenue, from whom are you going to collect it? From whose pockets are you going to take it? From people of wealth? From people with competency? From people who can well afford to pay it? Will the weight of this tax fall upon those who can afford to bear it? You can not sell enough beer to bring the Government such amounts in revenue without selling to millions of families with incomes so small that it is almost impossible for them to live now. You are not going to sell this beer in sufficient amount to bring this revenue from well-to-do homes. You are going to sell it in homes not well to do, upon the verge of want. You must sell to the poor. The amount which you could sell to the well to do, to the rich, would bring you little revenue. You must go elsewhere. If you get five hundred million, at least four hundred and fifty million would come from those who can not afford to pay any more taxes. It is a sales tax—a sales tax which reaches for the pennies of the poor, a sales tax which will require families to take something from their already meager resources. This is a tax which has neither law nor conscience nor mercy behind it.

And for what is the tax to be paid? It is paid either for that which is unlawful or for that which is a deception, a fraud. If the liquor you are to sell is intoxicating, it is sold in violation of the law. If it is not intoxicating, it is not what the people want and expect. It is a deception, a pretense.

Mr. NORBECK. Will not the tax be collected from the unemployed? Will it not come from those who are out of jobs?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I disclaim it will yield $500,000,000. I said there had been that claim made and that it was exaggerated. I base my claim on the actual figures of beer sold in 1916 and 1917 multiplied by 6, with a small allowance for increase in population. Therefore, I think there is no possible ground for the claim that $375,000,000 is an exaggerated estimate. When the Senator asks where is it going to come from, may I say to him that the testimony of the Prohibition Director is that at the present time in the United States there is a consumption of something like 23,000,000 or 24,000,000 barrels of illegal beer that is made, from which we derive no revenue at all. Is the Senator's argument correct that prohibition does prohibit and the amount of intoxication is going down as it is in England? Let me say to the Senator the figures which were quoted in regard to intoxication in England were taken from the Survey Graphic Magazine, an article written by a member of the British Royal Commission on Licensing, a report of the committee which just completed an exhaustive study of the liquor problem in England.

Mr. BORAH. They would not arrest people for drunkenness for the conditions which are described in the Manchester Guardian. They have passed beyond that point.

Mr. BINGHAM. They do not arrest people that are really drunk? Is that the idea?

Mr. BORAH. They do not arrest people who are drinking in their homes, and so forth, as described in the Manchester Guardian. They pay no attention to them. The only men they arrest in England, so I am advised, are men on the street disturbing somebody.

Mr. BINGHAM. What about in Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think they arrest them at all.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator thinks they do not arrest them at all in Washington, and yet whereas before prohibition there were only 50 young people between the ages of 18 and 21 arrested for drunkenness during an entire year, three years ago there were 600 such arrests of young people. The number of arrests for drunkenness in the city of Washington has doubled since prohibition went into effect, and yet the Senator says they do not arrest them here at all for drunkenness.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think they were drunk on beer.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; and that is the point I was trying to make. Very few people ever get drunk on beer. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT (rapping for order). There must be no demonstration of any kind in the gallery, or the Chair will order the galleries cleared. Under the rule of the Senate there must be order in the galleries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator was a member of the much-discussed lobby committee. I am sure he will remember that in the evidence adduced before that committee one of those who was most active, by contributions in money and otherwise, toward the success, whatever it may be, of the Association Against the Eighteenth Amendment frankly stated in a letter to one of his correspondents that if he could transfer the income taxes he was forced to pay over to the wage earners who would drink the beer of the country and could have the eighteenth amendment repealed, it would decrease his own income taxes $10,000,000 a year in one corporation alone. That was one of the Du Ponts.

Mr. BORAH. I remember that statement.

Mr. President, I have before me an editorial appearing in the Boston Post, a newspaper which, as I understand, is not "dry." It refers to the propaganda with reference to arrests in foreign countries decreasing and arrests for drunkenness increasing in the United States. It saw fit to make an investigation of the question. I quote from the Boston Post, assuming it to be, as I believe, an entirely responsible newspaper. It says:

> But the police of Paris have no difficulty in discovering drunken Frenchmen. And one has to be good and drunk in Paris to attract the attention of the police. Arrests for drunkenness in Paris per 10,000 population are three times that of New York, the wettest city in America.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, does the Senator agree that New York is the wettest city in America?

Mr. BORAH. I would not want to speak in a too complimentary manner of New York right now.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator does think that New York is the wettest city in America, and that it is easier to get a drink in New York than anywhere else?

Mr. BORAH. I have not the slightest information on that subject. It is one which requires experience, and I have no experience whatever on the subject.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought the Senator expressed his own view that New York was the wettest city in America.

Mr. BORAH. I was reading the statement in the editorial.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator agrees with what the newspaper says. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if New York, as the newspaper article says, is the wettest city in America, it is the only great city in America that has shown a marked decrease in arrests for drunkenness since prohibition, so-called, went into effect.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to digress too far to lodge any responsibility for that fact. The newspaper editorial goes on to say:

> In Paris, the arrests per 10,000 of population have averaged about 50 in the past few years. In New York the average is about 15 per 10,000 * * *.
>
> In Greater London the convictions (not arrests) for drunkenness have ranged from 48 to 50 per 10,000 in the past few years. In Edinburgh, Scotland, the ratio is startling as compared to New York. Edinburgh arrests for drunkenness have gone as high as 153 per 10,000 in the last 10 years. New York's high mark since prohibition was 18.34 arrests per 10,000 in 1924.
>
> The figures show the glibly repeated statement that European countries, with their wholesome beer and wine available to the citizens at reasonable prices, are not troubled with the problem of the drunkard to be entirely untrue.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield as soon as I state one other fact that I wish to put in the RECORD in connection with this subject. The bread bill of England in 1930 was £88,000,000; the milk bill of England was £86,000,000; the drink bill of England was £288,000,000.

Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator made any investigation as to the probable reason for the greater number of arrests, we will say here in Washington, since the eighteenth amendment went into effect than before, on the basis that under the eighteenth amendment and the laws to enforce it there was a penalty attached to acts the commission of which previously did not entail a penalty? Consequently an act that would be the subject of arrest after that time would not have been considered the subject of arrest previously. When a penalty is provided for an act to which previously no penalty was attached, the arrests, of course, increase. Is there not something in that?

Mr. BORAH. I have never investigated that question; I do not know, but I can well understand that might be so.

Mr. FESS. The reason I thought that was true is that the Senator and I and probably everybody else who was in Washington prior to 1918 or 1920 saw considerable drunkenness on the streets. I have not seen very much drunkenness since that date. So it does not appeal to me because there are a greater number of arrests in the records of the police court that that means drunkenness is increasing. I think that the opportunity for violation of the law which did not exist before because of the lack of law will account for the increase in arrests.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. President, one thing further. The Senator from Connecticut has cited the quality of beer which is now being drunk illegally, and so forth. Does the Senator think that those who drink such beer will exchange it for the 2.75 slop he is going to give them?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator contends that he has no knowledge of beer, and then he refers to certain beer as though it tastes very good and then to the "slop" that we are going to give them as though it tastes very bad. Where does the Senator get his ability to judge as to that when he claims he has no experience?

Mr. BORAH. I am asking the Senator does he think that those who drink beer will exchange 4 per cent beer for 2.75 per cent beer?

Mr. BINGHAM. The evidence brought to the attention of the committee was to the effect that beer is one of those things which are made best in large breweries and not in small quantities. There is an enormous amount of home-brew beer of a high potency being made to-day; that is true; but it is not the kind of beer that is considered by the beer drinkers as very palatable. The average beer drinker, according to the information given to the committee, would prefer to buy good, wholesome beer made in a large brewery under thoroughly sanitary conditions, even though it contained a smaller percentage of alcohol, than to drink what is referred to as "slop," but which the Senator seems to prefer to the other kind of beer.

Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, in the District of Columbia in 1914 there were 8,837 arrests for drunkenness. In 1920 right after prohibition the number fell to some 3,565; but in 1930 there were 14,409 arrests for drunkenness, or nearly twice as many as before prohibition; whereas in New York City during 1928, the only year for which I have the figures before me, the number was 13,353, or less than in Washington. Now, let us see what took place in Washington and New York City before prohibition. In New York City in 1903 there were 54,000 arrests for drunkenness. After that there was a very remarkable and steady decline until 1919, which was the low point, just before prohibition went into effect, when the number fell to something under 7,000. Then came national prohibition, and since then there has been a small rise, so that in 1928 the number was 13,353. However, what I wanted to call the Senator's attention to was that arrests for intoxication, so far as one can judge by the courts in New York City, were diminishing steadily in the preprohibition days, from the high point of 54,000 down to the low point of something under 7,000.

Mr. BORAH. That argument, Mr. President, might be very potent in advocating the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and I think that is the proposition which is before the country, namely, whether we will or will not repeal the eighteenth amendment; but I do not see that that throws any light upon the question involved in the amendment which is now before the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator brought in the New York figures; he read rather scornfully from the Boston Post to prove that European countries, where they have freely wine and beer, are not so well off as is America and that they have more drunkenness because, forsooth, the increase in arrests in New York City for drunkenness is less than in European capitals. I have, however, pointed out to the Senator the fact, with which he doubtless is not familiar, that New York City, frequently referred to as the wettest place in the country, is the place where they have the least intoxication or the least number of arrests for drunkenness per capita.

Mr. BORAH. That is better—"the least number of arrests."

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well. Neither the Senator nor I desire to discuss the enforcement of law in New York City. The Senator was the one who brought in New York City first, and not myself. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the city of Cleveland, for instance, we are informed that last year there were 32,000 arrests for drunkenness, which is more than for many, many years; and in that 32,000 the average age of persons arrested for drunkenness was only 25? In other words, 16,000 of those drunks were young people between the ages of 18 and 25, not one of whom was more than 12 years old when prohibition, that was to keep the young people from ever knowing the taste of alcohol, was adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, that argument, I think, would be worth considering in connection with the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought the Senator had brought in the argument in favor of prohibition.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator from Connecticut, in his opening statement, spoke about the arrests in the old countries diminishing and decreasing as compared with arrests for drunkenness in our country. I simply brought that in to show that there were two sides to the question, and I think I did so. The Senator is overenthusiastic in his cause.

Mr. BINGHAM. There are certainly two sides to this question.

Mr. BLAINE. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut is intended to accomplish a public purpose in a perfectly lawful way. I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that just the other day the Senate attempted to accomplish a public purpose in connection with an alleged unlawful product. That is the distinction to be drawn between the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut and the tax imposed on what are known as wort and malt sirup and malt extract. So it seems to me the proposition is a very practical one and does not involve at all the question of prohibition.

The proposal to tax those products which are the next-door neighbors to beer reminds me very much of the earlier prohibitionist who voted dry but always sought his liquor by way of the back door of a saloon. That is exactly what the Senate of the United States did the other day; it sought to tax liquor by way of the back door. It must be obvious to everyone that the taxation of the products of malt embraced in the amendment which was adopted by the Senate is but one step from the taxation of beer. There is but one step in the process of accomplishing the manufacture of beer from malt products, no matter by what name characterized, to beer.

It is presumed that wort, upon which the Senate imposed a tax but last week, is prohibited by the Volstead Act—the Prohibition Department so holds, as I understand. I am rather inclined to the opinion that the amendment adopted by the Senate, providing for a tax upon malt products, by implication, has modified the Volstead Act. If that is not correct, then do we propose that the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department are going to demand a tax of 15 cents a gallon on wort and 3 cents a gallon on malt extracts and sirups if those departments, or either one of them, hold to the proposition that those articles, or either of them, are prohibited under the Volstead Act?

Mr. President, we are flirting with a very dangerous proposition here. The Government must do one of two things: It must take the position that the amendment adopted by the Senate respecting the tax on malt products has by implication modified the Volstead Act or that the Government of the United States is going to exact a tax against an unlawful product. In other words, we propose by that amendment to wink at crime if either of those products are still maintained to be illegal by the enforcement departments of the Government. The proposal of the Senator from Connecticut, therefore, is to go at this proposition in a direct and candid way, and legalize the products of malt within the limits of the alcoholic content provided for by the amendment.

It was that feature that I desired to present to the Senate.

Now, just briefly, I desire to call to the attention of the Senator from Idaho the fact that the report that he read from the British paper sounded very much like a report submitted by the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League or by "Pussyfoot" Johnson, who had attempted his prohibition propaganda in Great Britain; but let me read from the testimony taken before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, of which the Senator from Idaho was and is a member. That testimony was given by Mr. John M. Morehead, American minister to Sweden, who has resided in Sweden as our American representative for a considerable period of time. Let me give the Senate the benefit of his testimony respecting the question relating to the control of the liquor traffic.

I have in my hand a part of that testimony. I doubt if any Senator will dispute Mr. Morehead's statements or question the accuracy of the figures he has given. He is our representative in Sweden. Surely he would not testify falsely respecting the statistical facts as he has presented them, and it will take but a brief moment to give a summary of those facts.

Sweden adopted what is known as the Bratt system for the control of the liquor problem. As I recall, it was in 1911 that the Gothenburg system was introduced in Sweden. Then, if I am correct—and I think I am—the Bratt system followed the Gothenburg system in 1914, and the official government figures for the period 1914 to 1930 show the following:

The consumption of spirits in Sweden decreased 32 per cent in that time.

The consumption of spirits in Stockholm, the metropolis of Sweden, decreased 47 per cent.

The consumption of beer of all strengths decreased 9 per cent.

Convictions for drunkenness in Sweden decreased 52 per cent.

Convictions of females for drunkenness in Sweden decreased 66 per cent.

Arrests for drunkenness in Stockholm decreased 76 per cent.

Arrests of females for drunkenness in Stockholm decreased 84 per cent.

Arrests for drunkenness of persons under 20 years in Stockholm decreased 83 per cent.

Arrests for drunkenness of persons from 20 to 30 years in Stockholm decreased 79 per cent.

Arrests for drunkenness of persons over 30 years in Stockholm decreased 79 per cent.

Arrests for drunkenness in Gothenburg, the principal seaport, decreased 66 per cent.

Arrests for drunkenness in Malmo, the third largest city, decreased 76 per cent.

Deaths due to chronic alcoholism in Sweden decreased 89 per cent.

Deaths due to chronic alcoholism in Stockholm decreased 100 per cent. Stockholm is the largest city in Sweden.

Cases of alcoholic insanity in Sweden decreased 51 per cent.

Cases of alcoholism in the State Hospital for Inebriates decreased 76 per cent.

Cases of chronic alcoholism in Stockholm decreased 88 per cent.

Crimes of violence in Sweden decreased 44 per cent.

Crimes of violence in Stockholm decreased 60 per cent.

Under a well-regulated and sensible system of liquor control, Sweden has demonstrated at least that all of the evils that flow from the excessive use of alcoholic liquors are being gradually wiped out.

Mr. President, are we going to set up this system of hypocrisy, taxing that which the Government has held illegal, for the purpose of obtaining $97,000,000 or a little less for the Treasury of the United States, or are we going to face this matter squarely and honestly and with candor and legalize beer containing a moderate amount of alcohol and start on the way to some system of the control of liquor? That system which ever has proven to be the most successful in the history of nations, of course, will be the system that would promise the greatest success here in our own country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator point out to the Senate what the system he is reading is?

Mr. BLAINE. I will endeavor to do it from the testimony.

The system, generally speaking, is State control and is one of licensing the individual. I will very inadequately outline the system, because I have not had the matter in mind for the last two or three weeks; but, generally speaking, it is a system of licensing the individual.

There are three types of liquor: Wine; hard liquors, including whisky, rum, and similar types of hard liquor; and then three classes of beer.

The Bratt system provides that the first class of beer shall have a maximum alcoholic content of 1.8 per cent by weight; class 2, a maximum alcoholic content of 3.2 per cent by weight. Those are the two classes of beer that are sold in Sweden. The third class of beer is the heavier export beer of over 3.2 per cent alcohol by weight. That is for export purposes alone.

The class 1 beer, or the lighter beer, is retailed in restaurants to be consumed alone.

Class 2 beer, the beer of medium alcoholic content, is sold to be taken away only in bottles which hold approximately one pint, and cost 4 cents if the bottle is returned.

As I said, the third class of beer, or the heavier beer, is permitted for export only.

Then there is a rationing system. I can not give just the number of quarts rationed to each individual, but there is a rationing system for the adult members of the family—a certain amount of hard liquor, a certain amount of wine. If the person who holds the permit—and that is all it is; it permits a person to go to a government dispensary, and there obtain his liquor—violates any of the laws or rules relating to the control of the liquor traffic, he loses his right to obtain liquor.

That is, generally speaking, the system that has been set up in Sweden. I am sorry I have not prepared myself to go into the matter in greater detail, but perhaps this brief outline will answer the question asked by the Senator from Nebraska.

The system of liquor control in Sweden, at least—they have now had experience with it there since 1914—has been a success. It has constantly decreased all that which comes from the immoderate use of liquor. Gradually that decrease has been going on, until in the great city of Stockholm, the metropolis of Sweden, there is not a single case of insanity due to alcoholism.

As the testimony given by Mr. Morehead disclosed, throughout the entire Swedish Nation there was developing moderation and temperance, and he gave his own personal observation that scarcely ever would one find a drunken man upon the streets anywhere.

The Swedish people have developed their system of liquor control gradually. Whenever they found that the bootlegger was being encouraged they changed the allotments that would be made to an individual, or reduced the price, realizing that through competition they could drive out the bootlegger. That is the way Sweden proposed to, and did almost to the point of perfection, drive the bootlegger from the realm.

That has been the experience of Sweden, and the figures I have given are the official figures taken from the official records of that nation furnished by the American minister to Sweden. I think the evidence is conclusive that when a system is set up such as is the Bratt system, and the more highly developed systems in some of the Provinces of Canada, a country then starts upon the road toward moderation and temperance.

Under the Swedish system not only do they undertake to control the apportionment of liquor to the individual but they have also set up plans for hospitalization. They carry on an educational work, by which they instruct the people of Sweden in the proper and moderate use of liquor and what the excessive use of liquor may mean. In Sweden they have developed an intelligence upon that question by and through which individuals are controlling their own appetites.

Here in the United States, as I have maintained, we are never going to be able to control the appetites of men by law, no matter whether those appetites have to do with liquor or food. It can not be done by law. You can not legislate good morals, you can not legislate moderation, you can not legislate temperance into men and women. Those qualities, those virtues come from environment and education, and the proper management and conduct of the Government in promoting those virtues.

Mr. President, this is a practical question. I do not think it involves at all the question of "wet" and "dry"; that is, fundamentally it does not. It does involve the question of whether or not we are going to be honest with ourselves, whether or not the Government is going to be honest with itself and with the people.

I maintain that we can not have a wholesome public sentiment here in the United States when we purposely impose a tax upon those products which the enforcement officers have declared to be illegal and which have been declared to be illegal by a court of the United States. We can not develop a wholesome public sentiment in the United States by engaging in a taxation plan which taxes a product that the enforcement department has declared to be illegal. It is not honest, it is not candid, and I am not surprised that prohibition is coming into disrepute more and more as the days go by. When we tax those products which the Prohibition Department has said are illegal under the Volstead Act, and then fail to legalize a product made out of these alleged illegal products, there ought not to be any public respect for that kind of law. It does not justify public respect. It justifies public condemnation.

Mr. President, if for no other reason than in the interest of honesty, we should adopt the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut. When we are going into this proposition, we ought to go in at the front door, go in lawfully, instead of going in at the back door, taxing a product declared by the enforcement officers to be unlawful under the Volstead act.

Mr. President, we can encourage public respect for law. We can demonstrate to the country that we have the courage to enter into this matter by the front door, and let the back door be closed.

I submit, Mr. President, in conclusion, that the exploitation of an alleged illegal product, in order to obtain revenue, should not be the conduct of a Congress or a parliament. Let us approach this matter candidly, and recognize the situation as it is, and raise revenue upon a lawful product.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has referred to the Swedish policy for controlling the liquor traffic. Like every other policy with reference to the control of the liquor traffic, there are two sides to it. It has by no means settled the liquor question in Sweden.

A great national committee has been organized in Sweden to take care of the illegal liquor traffic in Sweden, and I have here an appeal of that committee made to the people of Sweden. It recounts all the evils which are generally found in any country, whatever system may prevail. I shall not take the time to read it, but I ask to have the document printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Translated from Swedish Kalmar Tidning]

TO COMBAT AGAINST THE ILLEGAL LIQUOR TRAFFIC

An appeal of the National Committee Rikskommitten to all of responsibility-conscious citizens in the country:

During the later years observations have more and more been drawn to the illegal liquor traffic in the land, and it has appeared manifestedly clear to wider and wider circles that this traffic—home-brewing, smuggling, and peddling—brings with it great damaging social effects and contains a serious danger for the country and its people. It has at different parts of the country been ascertained that home-brewed and smuggled liquors are offered and sold at dance halls and places of amusement, and where work is carried on, at gates of alleys, on streets, and roads. Especially seem the young people to be exposed and sought for the liquor agents and peddlers' temptations. There are cases where youths of 15 have been led to purchase smuggled spirits and in intoxicated condition landed in custody of the police. There are also many cases of neglectful heads of families who have spent on smuggled spirit and home-brew what rightly should have been used for the proper support of wife and children.

Irrespective of one's opinion otherwise on the temperance question, and irrespective of what one thinks and feels about the present legally applied system of restriction, one must nevertheless convince oneself that the illegal liquor traffic, which is aimed at leading astray and corruption of the growing youth, generation, and to reap filthy lucre out of really neglectful family providers' sickly appetite for liquor, is an evil and charged with serious danger to the cultural values which through the people's own efforts have been created for now living and coming generations. To the young, who follow the lure into the illegal traffic, threatens a danger not only in that they are exposed to temptations of intoxicating themselves; they are also cultivated in the habit of lawbreaking. They learn to take part in crime, to share in hiding it, and to protect the offender. This means that the youngs' conception of right is dulled in a grave manner, thereby easily landing on the course of crime in a wider application.

A short time ago happened a case which horribly manifested the danger of the illegal liquor traffic. Not less than 10 people lost their lives and many others are made invalids through consuming Stockholm smuggled spirits, the same being found to be wood alcohol. This incident or grewsome drama (tragedy) ought to convince all that now at last a sincere effort must be undertaken to put a stop to this traffic which in various ways works destruction and poisoning.

Early this year was initiated at Westeroes a country-wide movement against home-brewing, smuggling, and peddling. During the summer preparations for such a movement have been in progress, and at a meeting in Stockholm, the 15th of October, was constituted "Rikskomitten"—the national committee—against the illegal liquor traffic. The purpose of the committee shall be to oppose, or rather cause a thoroughgoing combat against the illegal liquor traffic. The committee in its work shall solicit the cooperation of mechanic trade groups who possess special advantages in opposing the smuggling, and organize local committees which should represent temperance societies, trade branch unions, religious associations, temperance boards, young peoples' organizations of various kinds, etc. Representatives of municipal boards or municipal trustees (aldermen) are to be requested to participate in the work.

The "Rikskomittee" is fully conscious of its inability alone to accomplish anything. It craves assistance and support from all quarters, from all classes in the commonwealth, and from all groups of citizens in the country. It is for such help and such support the national committee appeals herewith to all of duty and responsibility conscious citizens in the land. The national committee against the illegal liquor traffic then appeals thus to associations and individuals to support this, the launched movement against the liquor bootleggers—Spritmarodöeerna. The call is to create a peoples' opinion against these, their enemies, so strong that they will find themselves forced to stop their activities.

Appeals and other writings may be had upon request from the National Committee Against the Illegal Liquor Traffic, Tunnelgata, 19B, Stockholm.

"Rikskomitten" against the illegal liquor traffic.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to prolong this debate. In my judgment, the case against the amendment has been ably and unanswerably presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

On the question of drinking in the United States since prohibition, I ask that an editorial appearing in the Washington Post on May 18, 1932, be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 18, 1932]

POVERTY AND DRINK

A recent statement by Col. George Davis, of the Salvation Army, Chicago, is as follows:

"Out of more than a million cases we have dealt with in the past 16 months, there were only 75 bad cases of drink, and of moderate cases only 500. From October 11, 1930, to February 3, 1932, we helped 1,102,545 unemployed men. Of this number, we found 99.92 per cent drink free. * * * The number of women coming to our doors with a tale of being ruined by drink is less than 1 per cent of the entire number, whereas in former days it was a considerable proportion. In our family welfare relief work in these days we seldom find need arising from strong drink on the part of one or other of the parents, whereas in the old days it was 90 out of 100 cases. In fact, poverty from drink has almost disappeared."

If the poor are in need of social aid to-day, then, it is not drunkenness that is responsible for their plight. Would they be in better condition if they drank? Colonel Davis does not think so. On the contrary, they would be in worse. Money can not be spent for meat and drink simultaneously; the same money will not buy both. When industry is ailing and unemployment rife, the dollar is hard to get. Even when it has been earned, it will purchase no more than a dollar's worth of any commodity. Used to buy liquor, it is spent for a luxury; used to buy bread, it provides a necessity.

Colonel Davis continues: "Before prohibition the Salvation Army would gather drunks by the truck load and bus load from the saloons and park benches. To-day one would have to search high and low in every American city to find at one time 100 men and women of the type the Salvation Army used to gather by the thousands under the rule of John Barleycorn."

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are three or four amendments of the same kind. Is there objection to voting on them en bloc? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Connally	Gore	La Follette
Bailey	Coolidge	Hale	Lewis
Bankhead	Copeland	Harrison	Logan
Barbour	Costigan	Hastings	McGill
Barkley	Couzens	Hatfield	McNary
Bingham	Cutting	Hawes	Metcalf
Blaine	Dale	Hayden	Moses
Borah	Davis	Hebert	Neely
Bratton	Dickinson	Howell	Norbeck
Broussard	Dill	Hull	Norris
Bulkley	Fess	Johnson	Nye
Bulow	Fletcher	Jones	Oddie
Byrnes	Frazier	Kean	Pittman
Capper	George	Kendrick	Reed
Carey	Glass	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Cohen	Goldsborough	King	Robinson, Ind.

Schall	Steiwer	Tydings	Walsh, Mont.
Sheppard	Stephens	Vandenberg	Watson
Shortridge	Thomas, Idaho	Wagner	Wheeler
Smith	Townsend	Walcott	White
Smoot	Trammell	Walsh, Mass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendments of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. If he were present, I understand he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I understand that if present the senior Senator from Alabama would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am privileged to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I understand that my pair, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], if present, would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am free to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CUTTING. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. If the Senator from Iowa were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. If present, I understand he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have noticed that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] did not vote. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote. I understand if that Senator were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, of course I would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] is necessarily absent, and if present would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—26

Barbour	Copeland	Lewis	Shortridge
Bingham	Davis	Metcalf	Tydings
Blaine	Hawes	Moses	Walcott
Broussard	Hebert	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Bulkley	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Bulow	Kean	Reed
Coolidge	La Follette	Schall

NAYS—55

Ashurst	Dickinson	Howell	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Dill	Hull	Sheppard
Bankhead	Fess	Jones	Smith
Barkley	Fletcher	Kendrick	Smoot
Borah	Frazier	Keyes	Steiwer
Bratton	George	King	Stephens
Byrnes	Glass	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Capper	Goldsborough	McGill	Townsend
Carey	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Cohen	Hale	Neely	Vandenberg
Connally	Harrison	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Costigan	Hastings	Norris	Watson
Couzens	Hatfield	Nye	White
Dale	Hayden	Robinson, Ark.

NOT VOTING—15

Austin	Cutting	Morrison	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Glenn	Patterson	Wagner
Brookhart	Long	Shipstead	Waterman
Caraway	McKellar	Swanson

So the amendments proposed by Mr. BINGHAM were rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, would it be in order for me now to offer my amendment proposing to increase the tariff tax on butter?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment would now be in order.

Mr. NORBECK. I now desire to offer the amendment. I ask permission to modify it and that, as modified, it may be stated at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota, as modified, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 245, between lines 10 and 11, to insert the following new paragraph:

(9) Butter, 4 cents per pound; oleomargarine and other butter substitutes, 8 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I have not assumed the pending bill to be a tariff measure, and I have voted generally against inclusion of tariff items therein, but the Senate has decided that it is a tariff bill. When first I proposed my amendment it carried a rate of 8 cents a pound on butter, which would be in addition to the present duty of 14 cents a pound. I have now modified the amendment so that it provides for only 4 cents a pound additional, which we consider an offset to the unstable currency of Canada, which gave the Canadians the American butter market when the price broke last fall. On that account the amendment will be helpful in a small way if it can be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULL. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 244, after line 9, it is proposed to insert the following new paragraph:

The Government of the United States agrees not to increase its protective tariffs above the present level for a period of two years, or to create new barriers or impediments to trade, provided other nations shall agree to pursue a like policy.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I explained the purpose and purport of the amendment when it was first proposed some days ago. I may now say further that this proposal has been very elaborately and extensively discussed by leading statesmen of this and other first-class nations. It is the uniform conclusion that it is entirely feasible, and nobody thus far has really offered any substantial objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Tennessee really think that this Congress can bind the next Congress by any action it may take on this subject?

Mr. HULL. Of course, that is elementary.

Mr. SMOOT. That is primary.

Mr. HULL. This is a proposal, Mr. President, directed to the important commercial nations of the world, if all are willing, to take a two years' holiday or to pursue a truce for a couple of years, while we are all taking stock of the perfectly chaotic conditions in all phases of economic affairs that we have here and everywhere; and it has been generally agreed that it would be a wise course to pursue.

This is merely a proposal to that effect. Of course, it would indicate a willing disposition on our part to halt, at least for the time being, at this session of Congress, and not reach to further extremes, provided other nations are willing to pursue a similar course. If there shall be any harm which can come from this sort of proposal, I should like for some Senator to suggest it.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has suggested that this Congress can not bind a subsequent Congress; but if other nations shall agree not to raise their tariff level, would this provision operate to suspend the flexible provision of the existing tariff law in so far as duties might be revised upward?

Mr. HULL. This amendment, if adopted, would not interfere with the present substantial level of tariffs under our tariff policy. The Tariff Commission makes certain recommendations and at the same time may recommend certain increases, but all the while it seems to be pursuing, at least for the present, the same general level of tariffs. This amendment is intended to suggest that the world shall stop its radical movements of tariffs upward which one country will pursue and then immediately another country will follow suit by retaliation or by the force of the example that has been set.

Mr. BRATTON. It would be a declaration of policy against such course of action if the other nations will act in concert with us?

Mr. HULL. It would be a declaration of policy which I think if once proposed by the leading commercial and industrial countries such as ours would be gladly received and accepted to every feasible extent by most other countries in view of the extreme extent to which every sort of trade barrier and trade obstruction has been carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL and Mr. BRATTON asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make merely a brief explanation. I have voted against all reductions and all increases of tariff rates proposed as amendments to the pending bill. I am, however, going to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee because it proposes neither an increase nor a decrease of tariff rates but is merely a declaration of policy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee on which the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER. I find I can transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I make that transfer and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are necessarily absent on account of official business.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—34

Ashurst	Coolidge	Hawes	Stephens
Bankhead	Copeland	Hull	Trammell
Barkley	Costigan	King	Tydings

So Mr. HULL's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is on page 245, after line 4, where the committee proposes to insert:

(8) Rubber, 5 cents a pound.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, that is not the next amendment. We are on page 247.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was passed over last night. Is it desired to return to it now?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, was it not the understanding that rubber was to come following the conclusion of the automobile items?

Mr. VANDENBERG. We have not concluded the automobile items.

Mr. HARRISON. I say, was it not the understanding that rubber was to follow those items?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That was my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 247, line 4, after the word "tractors" and the comma, to strike out "3 per cent" and insert "4 per cent," so as to read:

(b) Other automobile chassis and bodies and motor cycles (including in each case parts or accessories therefor sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof), except tractors, 4 per cent. A sale of an automobile shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be considered to be a sale of the chassis and of the body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I move as a substitute that subsection (b) be stricken from the bill.

I do not intend to repeat the argument I made last evening, to which the Senate listened very generously and with some partial response, at least.

I hope that the committee amendment—which, under the parliamentary situation, must be submitted first—will be defeated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the House provision of 3 per cent there would be a revenue of $44,000,000. Under the 4 per cent of the committee amendment there would be a revenue of $58,000,000, or a difference of $14,000,000 involved in the Senate amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what is the amendment we are about to vote on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is the committee amendment, which will be stated to the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 247, line 4, in the item "Other automobile chassis," etc., it is proposed to strike out "3 per cent" and insert "4 per cent."

Mr. DILL. But the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] said he wanted to strike out the whole section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the item proposed to be stricken out must first be perfected.

Mr. DILL. That is what I wanted to be certain of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I understand that he would vote on this question as I shall vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore of my general pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Having a general pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. If he were present, I understand that he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BYRNES. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BULKLEY (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BULKLEY. I feel constrained to withdraw my vote on account of having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DICKINSON. I desire to announce the pair of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. If the Senator from Iowa were present he would vote "nay," and if the Senator from Montana were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—29

Ashurst	Fletcher	Hebert	Smoot
Barbour	George	Kean	Walcott
Barkley	Gore	King	Walsh, Mont.

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course all of us can appreciate how difficult it is to have to vote for these obnoxious nuisance taxes, but I just want to make this observation. For some three or four weeks the members of the Committee on Finance heard witnesses and considered the various proposals brought before the committee. No member of that committee wanted to put this or that tax on this or that industry. Various plans were suggested to us as to how to raise the revenue, and we gave to the Senate the very best judgment of which we were capable, in order to balance the Budget and make receipts and expenditures balance.

I do not find fault with Senators who want to vote one way or the other, whether it is on a tariff item or some other item. Certain Senators may be under obligations or pledge to some constituents to vote for or against this or that item. We are all in the same boat; we have to go back home and answer to our respective constituencies as to why we voted this way or that way.

However, Mr. President, we are getting into a very bad mess with this tax bill. We all ought to strive to get something that will balance the Budget.

By the vote just taken, we struck $14,000,000 from the bill. We will have to raise that in some other way. We struck out of the bill as it passed the House certain provisions with reference to candy, jewelry, and some other things, and we can raise a little money by putting those items back. But the way we are going, we are going to strike this item and that, and after a while we will have to raise probably a hundred or a hundred and twenty-five million dollars on some other items.

I look into the faces of gentlemen here who sat for three weeks across the table and by me in the committee room, who had the courage to vote to increase this item and that, upon roll calls, and voted to make the roll calls public. They did not shun publicity of what they did.

When the Secretary of the Treasury came before us and laid a plan before us which might reconcile our differences, we went on record and said that we were going to stand by that. It did not affect the estate tax, it did not affect the income tax, but it affected the various excise taxes.

Nobody in the Senate can have his particular way as to whether a tax ought to go on candy or jewelry or on other things. We can not write a tax bill here upon the floor of the Senate very well. When we strike this item and that, we are getting into a more confused state all the time.

We picked out automobiles to tax because we did not believe in the sales tax, and did not want to impose it. There are gentlemen here upon the floor of the Senate who are voting to strike out this item to raise revenue and are going to vote against that one, simply because they think that after a while there will be such a deficit created that we will have to resort to the sales tax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I do not include the Senator from Pennsylvania, because I know he is not doing that. He voted for the amendment. I am not attempting to criticize; I am simply stating the situation as it exists.

Other Senators may be voting against this automobile tax in the hope that they can put over a proposition to put a higher tax on incomes, and others perhaps, for other reasons.

What I would like to impress upon the Senate is this, that whether we made a bad job of it or not, Senators ought at least to resolve the doubt in favor of the committee, which certainly laboriously worked to try to bring in a plan which might raise the needed revenue.

The automobile tax, of course, is obnoxious; but Congress has before placed a tax on automobiles. The tax was not removed entirely until 1928. In this proposed tax of 4 per cent we are not going as high on automobiles as we went in 1924, because the tax then was 5 per cent. We have not put the tax on trucks as high as it was in 1924, and did not attempt to, and did not put the tax on accessories as high as it was in 1924. We are merely trying to raise some money, and by the last vote, as I have said, $14,000,000 has been stricken from the bill.

I am, therefore, going to suggest, merely in the interest of trying to reconcile our differences here, and expedite consideration of the bill, and to clear up all the confusion which now exists and which will grow in the consideration of the bill, that those gentlemen who are interested in the sales tax present their amendment now, before we take up the admission tax, before we take up the tax on accessories, before we take up the rubber item, and these innumerable other excise taxes; that the sales tax amendment be presented to the Senate so that we can vote upon it. If a majority votes for it, very well—then we will have settled it; we will have put behind us some of these very irksome taxes and we will know where we are. We can save days and days and days of labor and conclude the consideration of the bill if the majority of the Senate is for the sales tax.

Let us not continue this situation of Senators who are leaders, who are members of the Committee on Finance, who have gone on record for these matters, who have gone on record to accept the compromise proposition presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, now voting against this item and that item. Let us settle the sales-tax matter now, and if there is not a majority of the Senate for it, then let us go about our work to adopt the recommendations or discard them one by one, and then afterwards we can take up again the amendment of the Senator from Michigan or the amendment of the Senator from Texas and raise the revenue from the sources they suggest.

I have entered several motions to reconsider the votes on some of the House provisions—on jewelry, on yachts, and various other things—and we can recur to them.

It seems to me, Mr. President, since we took votes in the beginning on the surtaxes and income taxes and the Senate expressed itself, and then took up the beer question and expressed itself on that, and those things are, for the time being at least, behind us, that we ought to take up the sales tax now and get it behind us, and we can then proceed at a faster gait.

I appeal to Senators who are for the sales tax to offer the sales tax amendment now, or, if they do not want to offer it now, let us stop killing this proposition and that proposition and take an adjournment until they can get the amendment ready so as to offer it to-morrow, so that we can get a vote and conclude the consideration of the bill at an early day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that it would be well to have a vote on the sales tax, so that we might know whether that method of taxation is to be employed in lieu of these so-called special excise taxes. But what I particularly wished to say at this moment was in connection with the impression which I think is to be drawn from the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi.

I believe I am really standing by the committee—that is, standing by the action of the committee as a result of two and a half weeks of deliberation—in the votes which I have thus far cast.

The committee really did not spend any time considering the proposal contained in this particular section of the bill for increases over the House rates on automobiles, nor did it give any time to the consideration of the reductions of the tax on admissions. What the committee really did was to work for several weeks and finally get a bill in shape, and then the Secretary of the Treasury came up with a little typewritten slip of paper, and, without having an opportunity to vote separately on the items contained on that slip of paper, we voted en bloc.

As a member of the committee, I was one of those who voted against the so-called compromise proposal presented by the Secretary, because I believed that the work of the committee after two and a half weeks had produced a bill which was more equitable than the bill suggested by the Secretary in his compromise.

Of course, the Secretary characterized it as a bill of atrocity, but nevertheless in all sincerity I believed that the bill as worked out by the committee at the end of its deliberations was a more equitable measure for raising the revenue required than was the compromise of the committee after a few moments' discussion with the Secretary of the Treasury.

So far as I am concerned, thus far in the consideration of the bill I have voted to stand by the action taken by the committee during its two and a half weeks of deliberation. The committee never considered increasing the tax on automobiles above the House rate. We accepted the House rate; that is, we accepted it up until the time the so-called compromise suggested by the Secretary was adopted one morning.

Therefore, I do not wish to be put in the position by the Senator from Mississippi of having abandoned the work of the committee. As a matter of fact, I believe that the work of the committee was abandoned by the committee itself, when, after two and a half weeks of arduous labor, it threw its work out of the window, and accepted this compromise of the Secretary without having an opportunity to vote separately on a single item contained in it.

As a matter of fact, the record will show that the senior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] endeavored to secure a separate vote on the reduction of the admission tax from 45 cents, as provided by the committee after we had gone over the matter, to 10 cents, as provided in the suggested compromise of the Secretary, and he was unable to do so.

I merely wished to make this statement because I do not want the impression to be left without note that members of the committee had abandoned the position which the committee itself had taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for a question. I am ready to yield the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator remember that in connection with the effort of the Senator from California to lower the admission tax, no vote was taken upon that proposition? The vote was taken upon the proposition of the Senator from California to reconsider our vote whereby we had adopted the so-called compromise plan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I think the Senator is mistaken. I think the Senator from California endeavored to secure a separate vote in the committee and that those who were in favor of the compromise program suggested by the Secretary adopted a motion to consider the propositions en bloc, and we were forced to swallow it at one gulp or not take it at all.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is referring to something which happened previously.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Subsequently the Senator from California renewed his motion to get a vote on the admissions matter separately, but the Senator from Connecticut and one other Senator had been alert enough, soon after the compromise proposal was adopted, to move its reconsideration and then move to lay the motion on the table, which was carried, and thus all reconsideration was precluded except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator remembers that the next morning the Senator from California did move to reconsider the vote whereby we had adopted the compromise plan, and that motion was lost.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He only got a chance to make that motion when it became perfectly obvious to those behind the compromise program that his motion would not carry. In order to curtail the interesting remarks of the Senator from California they agreed to let him have a vote on it, but, as a matter of fact, the Senator from Connecticut himself made the point of order that the Senator's motion was out of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not against the Senator's motion to reconsider, but against the Senator's motion to lower the admission tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the record here.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the record be read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Read the record. I know what I was trying to do.

Mr. SMOOT. The record shows the following:

Senator SHORTRIDGE moved that the committee reconsider its action in lowering the exemption of section 711, tax on admissions, from 45 cents to 10 cents. The motion to reconsider was defeated by the following vote: Yeas 6—SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, LA FOLLETTE, CONNALLY, GORE, and HULL; nays 12—WATSON, REED, KEYES, BINGHAM, THOMAS of Idaho, METCALF, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, SMOOT.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, of course history will take note of what the committee did. I trust the historian will make our record perfectly clear to posterity.

Mr. SMOOT. It is in the RECORD now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is in our record, but I am thinking of history and of the centuries to come. Not to waste time or indulge in levity, the House bill placed a tax on tickets of 46 cents or over. Upon the suggestion of one of its members, the Senate Committee on Finance first struck out "46" and inserted "45" cents. Thereafter, as stated, and the record discloses, it was reduced to the figure shown in the bill as reported to 11 cents. I then made a very earnest effort to reconsider and to stand upon what the committee had theretofore agreed upon. The result of my motion was, as stated, a vote of 6 to 11.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, while history is being rewritten and the fact is being divulged that the Senate acts upon its own convictions without much reference to what is done in committee rooms, I would like to say for the benefit of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that there are many of us here who recognize his seductive qualities; but since we are earnest and have a conviction in favor of the sales tax and intend to press that question at the proper moment, I serve notice on him as one of that group that my virtue at least is intact and I have no intention of departing from the orderly procedure with this bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a word in respect to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi and then a word on something that seems to me to be of vastly more importance. I have looked at the list of the 29 Senators who voted in favor of sustaining the committee action. I know of my own knowledge that 16 out of the 29 who voted to sustain the committee favor the sales tax. I have looked at the list of those who were paired in favor of the committee's amendment, which has just been rejected by the Senate, and of the seven Senators who were paired in favor of the committee amendment I know of my own knowledge that five are in favor of the sales tax. So I do not think it fairly can be said that those who favor the sales tax are trying to break down the action of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I do not say that everybody who favors the sales tax is trying to do that. I tried to make a very fair statement. I said some of them were. The thing I was trying to impress on the Senator and the Senate was that it would be much better if we could settle the sales-tax question now. Does not the Senator recognize that some Senators who are for the sales tax are voting against these committee propositions?

Mr. REED. I hope that is not so. I know no one can be more ardent in advocating the sales tax than myself, and yet I feel the responsibility is so great upon us to sustain the action of the committee while we are going through these committee amendments that I expect to vote for the committee amendments right straight down the list, and then to appeal to every other advocate of the sales tax to do the same thing. When we have finished, when we have gone through the committee list, when we have put on all these special unfair taxes on particular industries, then I think it will be obvious to the great majority of the Senate that the sales tax which is uniform at a low rate is vastly preferable, and I hope then that the condition of the bill as they see it, with the committee amendments adopted, will be such as to recommend the sales tax to the Senate.

It would be a wrong policy, and I agree with the Senator from Mississippi about that, for us to try to slaughter the committee's work and expect that the bill should become such a mess that we would be driven to resort to the sales tax. I do not think that is a sound policy. I believe we can safely adopt the committee amendments, and then, contrasting them with the sales tax, we will have argument enough in favor of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Would not the Senator favor the sales-tax amendment's being offered now, and let us get through with it, or adjourn until to-morrow and fix a definite time to work it out?

Mr. REED. I have nothing to do with offering the sales-tax amendment. As the Senator knows, it has been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and he will follow his own counsel and present it when he gets ready. I think it is true that it is better to go through with the committee bill so the Senate may see the picture and know the contrast between the sales tax on the one hand and the committee bill on the other, than it is to put up the sales tax now and ask it to compete with an uncertainty. We do not know what is the alternative of the sales tax.

Mr. HARRISON. I know there are a good many over here who are not going to stand for this condition very much longer.

Mr. REED. That is a question to be settled by Senators who are going to offer the sales-tax amendment.

Mr. President, I want for a moment to address myself to something that seems to me to be very much more serious.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I would like the Senator to yield long enough for me to say that he has stated my position exactly. I am not a member of the committee. I am voting for these excise taxes not because I think they are wise but because I think we have got to balance the Budget, and the question will lie between this way and the other way. I am going along with the committee under protest, and then when the sales tax is offered I shall vote to choose that rather than the excise tax.

Mr. REED. That is exactly my position. I want in all sincerity to make the committee bill just as good as I can and sustain it in its integrity so that when the alternative comes, when the dilemma is presented, we will have been completely fair to the committee bill, and if we lose on the sales tax then at least we shall have a decent bill as the alternative.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator and others have referred to these taxes on the automobile industry as excise taxes.

Mr. REED. They are.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to know the difference between the taxes under consideration now and the sales tax.

Mr. REED. There is no difference. All the taxes that the Senator will find in section 602 and the sections which follow are sales taxes at varying rates, as low as 3 per cent on chewing gum and as high as 50 or 55 per cent on lubricants. It is a sales tax bill that could be written better by 50 of the present occupants of St. Elizabeths, but it is a sales tax nevertheless.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Do I understand from what the Senator said that if we adopt the amendments proposed by the committee, then when the sales-tax provision is proposed if it is adopted it will be substituted for some of the amendments of the Finance Committee?

Mr. REED. For practically all of those in section 600 and the sections following under that title.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if I understand the facts correctly, voting for the committee amendments will not prevent the elimination of these taxes if the sales tax is adopted?

Mr. REED. Precisely. The Senator has it right.

Mr. President, the eyes of the whole world are on the Senate at this minute—not only the eyes of the United States but the eyes of the business men, the financiers, the bankers, the statesmen of the entire world are on us now. What we do will determine the standing of America in respect to commercial integrity in the eyes of the whole world and in the eyes of history.

Hungary to-day has a moratorium for all debts. It is expected and frankly stated in the newspapers that before more than three or four days have passed Austria will be forced likewise to go on a moratorium. Most of the nations of the Baltic are expected to follow suit in short order. The Danubian conference was a failure. Southeastern Europe is on the verge of public and private bankruptcy. Hardly any country in Europe remains upon the gold standard. Switzerland, Holland, France, and Belgium are conspicuous exceptions, but even France and Belgium are on a gold standard which has very drastically reduced the value for their unit of currency. France in effect repudiated 80 per cent of her currency and then went on the gold basis for the 20 per cent that was left.

America stands almost alone in the civilized world as having preserved the integrity of her currency, having kept her promise to all of her creditor class, to all of those from whom she herself has borrowed in the war time and since then. The world is cynical of our ability to maintain our good resolutions. The world is cynical of our ability to keep our financial self-respect and to show the courage that is necessary to maintain a sound currency. The best proof of the fact that the world is cynical is the list of foreign-exchange quotations which we see printed every day on the financial pages of our newspapers.

At the present moment almost all of them are over the gold-export point. We lost last week, I am told, approximately $127,000,000 in gold exported from this country, drawn from us in just the same spirit that a frightened few depositors draw out their deposits from some bank about which rumors have been circulated. It is exactly the same in the shipments of gold across the ocean as in the payment of bills at a bank that is under suspicion. Exactly the same thing is happening to us as a Nation. Our depositors are making a run on the bank. They are going to keep it up until their confidence is restored.

We can stand that run for a considerable time. Thanks to that law which we all united in passing, for which no one side and no one person really deserves credit—the Glass-Steagall bill, which we all united in passing—we have made available for these withdrawals a large part of our stock of gold that would not otherwise be available. We can stand the run a long time, a much longer time than most of our depositors think we can. But there is an end, of course. They have taken a large part of that gold now. There is an end to the run that we can stand. That is true of every country just as it is true of every bank. If all the depositors of the strongest bank on earth appeared at that bank suddenly some morning and demanded 100 per cent of their deposits, either it is not a bank at all or else it would not be able to pay them. That is true of every country. That process of withdrawal, Mr. President, will stop the very instant the world knows that we here in this Chamber have the courage to balance our National Budget, to pay as we go, to maintain our money in its present soundness. Just so soon as we show the will to balance the Budget our troubles will be over.

Mr. President, it is not patriotic for us—and I include myself—to weigh these questions by deciding whether we would like or dislike to put this or that tax on a particular business. I do not like to put a tax on the automobile industry. Its prosperity means the prosperity of millions of our citizens, and I do not want to do anything to impede it. It is not a question whether or not we want to tax the automobile business. We do not; all of us do not. We do not want to put on any new taxes. The question is very much bigger than that; it is very much bigger than what the automobile manufacturer or the automobile dealer or the automobile driver wants. It is a question of the preservation of the soundness of their country and that must take precedence of the wishes of any business. That is why we may, properly enough, answer the torrent of letters that pours in on us from each business that dreads or dislikes a tax that there is something bigger than their preference at stake.

Presently we are going to vote on a motion to strike out what is left of the tax on passenger cars. We would all like to strike it out; nobody likes to create new taxes and put them on legitimate industries, but, Mr. President, when we are deciding that question, let us decide also what other business we shall single out to tax if we are going to exempt this one, because striking out taxes is not enough; striking out taxes accomplishes nothing, unless someone will find another source of revenue to substitute for that which we forswear.

So I beg, Mr. President, that the Senate will continue the consideration of this bill with a sober realization of what is involved. It is more than the convenience of taxing this one or that one; it is a question that goes to the very life of our Nation.

Mr. HAWES, Mr. CUTTING, and Mr. CONNALLY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I think every Senator realizes that the Finance Committee were confronted with a most difficult and intricate problem. I have not been able to find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, either of the House proceedings or the Senate proceedings, a disposition to avoid an honest endeavor to balance the Budget, but to-day I have listened to discussions of what happened within the Finance Committee, of the various roll calls, of the opinion expressed of this member and the opinion of that member of the committee, and how they arrived at their conclusions, the intimation being that they were hurried in their conclusions, but that is not going to affect my judgment. My responsibility is to decide individually the best course to pursue.

I agree with the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the time has come for perfect frankness.

We know now, of course, that Hungary and Austria and other countries are in trouble, and it may be they will look to us for inspiration, but I want to say now that I have decided, in my mind, to support a manufacturers' sales tax, eliminating from its operation food, drugs, clothing, and agriculture. I believe that if that question had been presented to the House in a clear-cut form it would have passed the House, and I believe if the Senate sends it back to the House, after that body has had an opportunity to reflect and to see the other side of the question, a manufacturers' sales tax, restricted in the manner I suggest, will be acceptable to the House as a revenue-raising measure.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I find no fault with the Senator from Missouri for favoring a sales tax, but does the Senator think that it might promote a more orderly procedure here if it should be offered now so that we could vote on the proposition before we take up the other items in the bill?

Mr. HAWES. No; I disagree with the Senator's political psychology.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me ask the Senator one other question. Does the Senator think it is just and fair to those of us who are voting for the provisions now in the bill, to whom these various taxes are just as objectionable as they are to the Senator from Missouri and others who may believe in a sales tax, for us to be going upon the record and voting for them while the Senator and others who want to get the sales tax are voting against them in the hope that after a while there will be such a deficit that we will have to take it?

Mr. HAWES. No; I do not think it is quite fair; I think it is an injustice to men to be compelled to vote for things of which they do not approve, but upon which they are compelled to take a position through force of circumstances. I think it is unfair, and I wish it could be avoided; but, as for me, I think the time has come for perfect frankness. I believe in a broader spread of taxation than to put the burden upon a few. Why should we not reach that conclusion?

I think the Senator from Mississippi has the courage of his convictions, and I have very great respect for the Senator from Pennsylvania, who follows the committee, and for the Senator from Wisconsin; but what the committee has done is one thing, and what individual Senators here will do is another thing.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. If that is going to be the attitude, then why should Senators on the floor of the Senate follow their colleagues on the committee? I always follow my colleagues on a committee—I am an organization man—because I have faith in them, and I think that some of us may properly expect the same treatment from others.

Mr. HAWES. As Members of the House of Representatives the Senator and I came to understand that the committee that reported this measure to the House was an intelligent and hard-working committee, and we followed that committee—at least I did. So in the Senate I usually follow the committees, but in this case I think the decision was not upon the merits of the case but upon political psychology and the fear of not being able to pass this measure through the House. In that respect I disagree with the Senator from Mississippi. I believe, after we vote down the nuisance taxes, the objectionable taxes, such as the automobile tax, such as the tax which would compel every man who draws a check to put a stamp upon it, such as the tax on the amusements of the people out of all proportion to the profits from the business, and when the House knows that the Senate has discussed all these questions and is sending back to that body a limited sales tax, understanding its limitations, that there will be a reversal of opinion in the House. So I am not failing to follow the judgment of the committee, but I think the committee is wrong in its political psychology.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator yields the floor may I ask him another question. I find no fault with the Senator for thinking that the sales tax may pass the House; it may; I do not believe anybody can tell whether it will or not; but I was so much interested in the question that I went over there to make an investigation. I talked about the matter with the very highest Members there, including those who supported it and those who opposed it, numbering not less than 25 or 30, and I came to the conclusion that because of the large vote against it, 70 on one occasion and 75 on another, it could not possibly pass.

The Senator thinks it might pass. That is all right; but why can we not get a vote on the proposition now instead of waiting for a while? If the attitude of those who are for the sales tax is going to be to vote down the various proposals reported in the bill and then after a while take up the sales tax, I suggest that now, by unanimous consent, all the recommendations of the committee may be rejected, embodying in the agreement that a motion to reconsider will be in order and may be made, and then that the sales-tax amendment be taken up. I am willing to follow that procedure, but there is no use spending the remainder of this week voting on the various proposals in the bill, the Senate committee being repudiated every time and the provisions being eliminated by the votes of Senators who want to balance the Budget just as much as those of us who are sponsoring the provisions of the committee bill, but who will vote against those provisions in the hope of putting over a sales tax.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As the author of the pending substitute, which seems to have precipitated this debate, I am particularly challenged by some of the critical observations submitted by the able and earnest senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. Even though I may be disagreeing en route through this bill with some of the recommendations brought in by the Finance Committee as a result of the mandate of the Secretary of the Treasury, there is no reason why any inference should be suggested or any assumption reached, either in or out of the Chamber, that I am any less concerned about balancing the Budget and about completing an adequate revenue bill than is the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania himself.

I would be the last man to leave this Chamber without a balanced Budget and an adequate provision of public revenue. I will vote to tax any source of revenue which is ultimately necessary in order to balance the Budget. But I am unable to concede that there is anything at variance with this objective or unpatriotic in any of its implications if Senators undertake to perfect the bill before it comes to a finality. This is said with entire respect for the members of the Finance Committee, who have given complete devotion to their difficult task.

But what are Members of the Senate to do when they reach these various amendments in due order? Are they to voice the convictions that are in them respecting the effect of these amendments upon the welfare of America or are they to sit supinely silent, simply because they confront the recommendation of the Finance Committee? Is this a sacrosanct mandate, beyond improvement, or is it a recommendation directed to the Senate's free judgment?

What am I to do when I confront amendments putting utterly discriminatory and hobbling taxes upon the automotive industry? Am I to sit silent in the face of them, when in my judgment they will do infinitely more harm to the commercial structure of America than anything else that has been done legislatively in the last three months?

When that is my sincere conviction, am I to pass it by and not give those in the Senate who agree with me an opportunity to register their conviction accordingly?

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] says that the pending problem is much bigger than a question of what the automobile manufacturers want. That is entirely correct; and the reason why I have submitted amendments to strike out these automobile taxes is because I believe the automobile taxes are infinitely bigger than anything that the automobile industry itself wants or any automobile driver wants, and bigger, even, than the wisdom of the great Finance Committee itself. I believe it is the key industry in America, through which a trade resurgence can be best stimulated. I know that this is the industry which saved America in one other depression. I know that it is the industry which reaches out and touches over a wider sphere more collateral industry, more labor, more related capital, more related activity, more jobs, more trade than any other industry in this land; and I know that if it is permitted to proceed unhampered and unhobbled in the plans which it has dared to make in the face of this depression, it will make a larger practical contribution to the commercial rejuvenation of the United States in terms of actual employment and trade than all the legislation we can pass within these halls. I know that these proposed discriminatory taxes are clearly calculated, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, to curb these courageous plans and discourage their success in the American market place.

If that is my conviction, is it patriotic or is it not, to propose that this stimulating influence shall be released and encouraged in the economic life of the United States?

The Senator from Pennsylvania says that it is not patriotic to say that we like or dislike any specific tax; that we must think of the problem as a whole. That is precisely the only basis upon which I have submitted this automotive appeal to the Senate of the United States. I have not asked for a single discriminating favor in behalf of this industry. I have said that it is ready to take its full share of any kind of a universal tax which is put upon it equally with other industry in this land. I have not sought any special privilege for them. They ask no favor from this Government or from this Congress. They only ask for a free, fair chance on a parity with other industry in this land to go ahead in the brave prospectus which they have dared to write in the face of this depression, and which, if they are permitted to proceed, I repeat, is calculated to do more for commerce in America than any other influence that can be released in our economic life. It is precisely because I insist upon thinking of the problem as a whole, patriotically, I hope, that I am forced into disagreement with the Finance Committee respecting these particular amendments.

So, Mr. President, I can not consent by my silence to any suggestion from the Senator from Pennsylvania that there is anything lacking in patriotism or in devotion to the cause of the country in persisting in a presentation of economic realities to the Senate in respect to these various items as we come to them in this bill. When those items have been discussed upon their merits, and when the judgment of the Senate has been taken, I am satisfied to take the conclusion; and whatever that conclusion finally calls for by way of additional or substituted revenues in order to balance the Budget, I would stay here forever before I would leave without concluding precisely the type of a response to our fundamental Treasury obligation for which the patriotic Senator from Pennsylvania himself pleads.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I resent the insinuation and the innuendo that the only Senators on this floor who are interested in balancing the Budget are Senators who will vote for the so-called nuisance taxes. That is the plain inference to be drawn from what has been said here.

The Senators in this Chamber who propose to balance the Budget by increasing the income taxes to the war level are as anxious to balance the Budget and as patriotic as any other group of Senators; and the Senators who believe that the income taxes should be of the amount declared by the committee to be reasonable, plus a so-called manufacturers' excise tax, are likewise as patriotic as any other group.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator did not think I was insinuating anything of the kind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator's remarks, if I interpreted them correctly, were that he and those who were supporting his position in voting for these excise taxes were somewhat more concerned about balancing the Budget than those who differed from him, and there was some question raised by him about the devotion to duty in this great crisis of other Senators who chose a different course from his.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to be able to correct the Senator if he got that impression.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. HARRISON. In the humblest way I say it is a wrong construction. It was only because of my defectiveness in being able to express myself according to my own heartbeats and thoughts that the Senator got that impression.

I thought I said that those Senators who were for the higher surtaxes, as well as those Senators who were for the sales tax, were just as anxious to balance the Budget as those who wanted this proposition or that; that it was merely a difference of opinion; because, may I say to the Senator, there was no Senator on the committee who worked harder or voted more strongly and more consistently to raise the Budget than did the Senator from Massachusetts. I was only trying to say that if we are going to vote on the sales tax, we ought to vote on it now instead of waiting until after a while. If the Senator has such a sales tax, I hope he will offer it now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will deal with that in a moment.

I frankly feel that the Senator in his remarks—I will be frank about it—had in the back of his head the fact that in the committee some of us voted for some of these nuisance taxes and now are not voting for them. I may do him an injustice in feeling that way, but I want to discuss it; and if the Senator did not have that in mind, I should be glad to have him say so.

Mr. HARRISON. I did say that I looked into the faces of Senators on the other side and some Senators on our side who had voted for these propositions in the committee who were not voting for them now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes. Does not the Senator know that we assumed in the committee at the outset that we were to construct and frame the bill along the lines of the House bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And that later proposals were made, one on the part of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and the other on the part of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], to substitute a different policy in framing the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely; and the Senator from Massachusetts himself in the committee stood for a sales tax, and he voted for a sales tax in the committee. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] has just stated, however, that he is going to vote against these propositions in the hope of getting the sales tax; and I was afraid that some of the others might be in the same position. For that reason, I thought that if we could vote on the sales tax now, we might eliminate that particular proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Now, let me say a word about my position on the sales tax.

When I went into the committee to frame this bill I did not believe that I would ever vote for a manufacturers' excise tax. I came to a different conclusion, just as the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee did. After hearing the discussion apropos and the guessing and exchanging on the levying of special nuisance taxes, fixing some at 3 per cent, some at 4 per cent, some at 7 per cent, and some at 10 per cent, some at 35 per cent, in the case of lubricating oil, I decided that the only fair tax under all the circumstances, if we are going to levy excise taxes, is, in view of the present emergency, a tax that is broad at the base and is small in amount and reaches all manufactured articles except the necessities of life. I was particularly impressed that general instead of special excise taxes were decidedly preferable and more equitable.

I came to that conclusion after hearing all discussions on the various methods of levying taxes, without any thought whatever of supporting a manufacturers' excise tax at the outset. I came to that conclusion when I got telegrams and letters from the owners and workers in the soap and rubber factories of Massachusetts, and the employers and employees in the candy factories of Cambridge and Boston, Mass.; when I got telegrams from the factories manufacturing cheap jewelry at Attleboro, North Attleboro, and Taunton telling me how desperate conditions were and the extent of unemployment, and appealing not to put a tax of 10 per cent on their product; and when I got telegrams like the one I have in my hand, which I received from Somerville, Mass., to-day and which is similar to hundreds of others I have received. Let me read it:

I understand automobile tax will come before the Senate to-day. Hope you cast your vote against it. Local Ford assembly plant, employing 2,848 men, opened recently. The employment of this number of men greatly reduces unemployment in our city. Any tax on automobiles would retard sales and throw men out of work. We urge you to support a general manufacturers' excise tax that will treat all industries equally.

Is it unpatriotic, is it un-Democratic, when an excise tax is proposed that we believe is unfair and unjust and going to impair our industries and cause unemployment, to raise our voices here and say "No"? Must we say "Yes" or have our patriotic motives impugned? Must we stultify our convictions when we think a tax is an unfair levy and an indefensible burden under present depressed economic circumstances?

I repeat, I came to this conclusion after this bill was in the process of formation, just as the Democratic members of the House Ways and Means Committee did. They never dreamt at the outset of reporting such a measure. After seeing the unfairness and injustice of these special sales taxes, however, I reached the conclusion that the soundest, fairest, most equitable tax we could impose was not a special sales tax on haphazard selected commodities of certain industries or admission taxes, but a general excise tax upon all industries, eliminating the necessities of life.

Mr. President, I went along with the committee on the assumption that the bill was to be drafted as this bill is written and as the House bill was written. I voted for some of these nuisance taxes, and I voted against some of them. I tried to determine, in seeking to balance the Budget, whether the rate ought to be 3 or 4 per cent. Sometimes I voted for the higher rate; sometimes for the lower rate. But when it was all over I reached the conclusion that it was my duty and my obligation to myself and to my constituents to favor the elimination of all these taxes from the bill, and to levy a small basic tax upon the finished product of all industries. I will say further, so much am I opposed to these so-called nuisance taxes that I am almost convinced that, rather than go back to them, I would accept a proposal to increase the income-tax rates. I am not declaring that I have reached that conclusion yet; but I am drifting in that direction very rapidly, because it seems to me these taxes are entirely indefensible.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi suggested that the time has arrived for the presentation of an amendment to this measure embodying the principles of the so-called manufacturers' excise tax. When in the discussion of legislation, the discussion of bills on this floor, has it been proposed that amendments from the floor be offered before the committee amendments were dealt with?

When before were Members of this body invited to propose amendments from the floor before we knew what was to become of the committee amendments? Have we ever in the history of this body—and I know we have not since I have been here—undertaken to legislate in that fashion and manner?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that I asked unanimous consent that the regular order be followed, and it was refused.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the regular order we have been following has been the taking up of committee amendments, and offering amendments to the committee amendments. That is what we have been proceeding to do.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My good friend from Mississippi knows how to play the parliamentary game as well as any man on this floor, and I am sure that if he were in my position he would be the very last Senator to move at this stage of the proceedings an amendment of the character I propose to offer. He is too clever to make any such proposal as that, and he knows that as we go through the discussion of this bill and analyze the manner and way in which these so-called nuisance taxes have been levied, a mere guess here and a guess there as to what the rates should be, that there will be a feeling in this body of "plague on all your taxes," and there will be a movement either in the direction the Senator from Michigan wants us to go or in the direction of an emergency manufacturers' excise tax, which I am to propose.

Let me say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have not asked any Senator to lend me his conscience in the matter of voting on these excise taxes. I have made no trades. I think the Senator will at least give me credit for not indulging in that practice.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator would not indulge in that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I feel very strongly that these nuisance taxes are a mistake, that I can not defend them, and I judge, by the very fact that the Senator is anxious to avoid a roll call upon them now, he has not very much faith in them himself. Is he going to incorporate them in this bill, not on their merit but by force or threats?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator knows——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That he has some doubt about sanctioning the special taxes whole-heartedly. His defense is that it is the only way in which we can balance the Budget, rather than a firm and honest belief that they are a just tax and an appropriate tax to levy in this emergency. Some other Senators sincerely believe there is a better and a fairer method of raising the necessary revenue.

I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course I am on record, as the Senator from Massachusetts is. I made my record and I do not run away from it at all, and am willing to go right through and vote for every one of the items. I would like to see them adopted. But I wanted to ask the Senator, because I am sure he has been working on this amendment a long time, and I know it is a good amendment, it is in good form if the Senator is behind it, because when he does things he does them right. If he will just lend that amendment to me, I promise him, not for him but for myself, to offer it and ask for a vote on it now. Will the Senator lend it to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate the Senator's kindness, and I will be glad to lend it to him. I hope that he will not be guilty of a breach of trust or confidence and offer it.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggested that I would offer it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say that within 10 minutes one of the experts has come to me with the amendment and has made corrections in it, so that I can have it sent to the printer. That indicates I have not been holding back the amendment. Only within 10 minutes has the expert who sits next to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] come to me with the amendment. But who more than myself has the responsibility of determining when and in what form the amendment will be offered?

Furthermore, the provision of the amendment depends on what we vote out of this bill. Whether the rate is 1½ per cent or 1¾ per cent or 2 per cent or 1 per cent depends on the action of the Senate. I observe the Senator from Michigan bows his head. He appreciates that action by the Senate first is absolutely essential in order to determine upon the form the amendment should take.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I may point out to the Senator that when the 1918 income-tax rates were before the Senate the very shrewd and smiling Senator from Mississippi tried to get the sales tax up at the same time.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. He tried to outstrategy us, but we were not quite as dumb as he thought.

Mr. HARRISON. I admit I have been outdone. If I had had my way, we would have voted on all these propositions before we got into the excise taxes.

Mr. COUZENS. I raised the very question the Senator from Massachusetts has raised, as to how we can tell what the surtaxes or the sales tax should be until we have determined what is necessary to balance the Budget.

When the income-tax rates came up, I asked the Senator from Utah to let action on the income-tax rates be put off until the last, so as to see what rates were necessary to balance the Budget. But the Senators were anxious to go ahead.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let us suspend trying to tell other Senators what their duty is. Let us suspend trying to read the consciences of other men, and doubting the motives that actuate them in voting "yes" or "no" when the roll is called. Let us give other Senators credit for a little patriotic spirit and for a little zeal and earnestness about getting the Budget balanced sanely and properly, and let us give them credit for realizing, as some of us do to the very depths of our hearts, the awful financial cataclysm that is impending in this country to-day. It is for that very reason, because of the terrible conditions which may await us before many days intervene, that I hesitate to put upon burdened industries, in fact, in the matter of one rate, on every industry, a tax of 35 to 50 per cent. I refer to the industries which use lubricating oil. I hesitate to put upon these tottering industries these excessive taxes. If that is a mistaken attitude, then I must be convicted of entertaining a wrong concept of my present duty.

It seems to me that we could serve the country no better in this emergency than by levying, on a broad base—exempting all the things the masses of the people have to buy to sustain life with, a reasonably small tax upon all the products of our industries.

Mr. President, I can not understand why the fact that a Senator would vote against a nuisance tax would so disturb the Senator from Mississippi and so excite and alarm him. I am really at a loss to know. One would think that upon the vote on this one item in this bill depended whether or not we were going to balance the Budget.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator from Mississippi does not harbor anything but love and affection for the Senator from Massachusetts, because we have fought together in the Committee on Finance, not only at this time, but heretofore, and we have fought political battles in the past, and will fight them together in the future.

There is no difference in the world between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself except that he is going to vote for the sales tax and I am going to vote against the sales tax; that he does not want to vote for the sales tax until these other matters are out of the way, and that my judgment leads me to think that the best thing to do is to vote on it now so that we can conclude the consideration of the bill more quickly. Those differences shall not make any difference in our personal and political relations, or in my strong affection for the Senator. The Senator knows my position so far as the tariff is concerned. I signed a report which he himself wrote, which went pretty far. I might have gone a little farther even than he did on that matter. I have tried to keep my Democratic record straight on these tariff items. Everybody in the Senate knows, I think, how I have felt about them. But I never try to criticize any of my colleagues, and I am not doing so now. I am sorry that my friend from Massachusetts feels somewhat offended about it.

Mr. President, I was appealing to the Senator, and I thought I could get him to offer the amendment. I still hope that he will offer it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I want to submit a unanimous-consent agreement.

The Finance Committee, as Senators know, worked on this bill about five weeks before we brought it into the Senate. The distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], as chairman of that committee, has unrelentingly and unremittingly labored all of that time. We have been meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning and sitting until 10 o'clock at night every day since the bill has been before the Senate and I want to suggest that when the Senate takes a recess to-day, it takes a recess to convene at 10 o'clock to-morow, and that we meet at 10 o'clock each day and run until 7 in the evening and dispense with the night sessions. If we do that, I confidently believe we shall make more progress with the bill than we have been making at the night sessions. I submit that suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator ask unanimous consent?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. A number of Senators have asked me to agree to some such arrangement, thinking, perhaps, that if that were done we would do just as much work within the hours suggested as we are doing in the hours we are now sitting, and I need not say why Senators arrived at that conclusion.

As far as I am concerned, I feel grateful to the Senator from Texas for what he has said in relation to the work I have done, but I do not want that in any way, shape, or form to influence any Senator, because I can work long hours just as well as not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Utah, is perfectly willing to work 11 hours a day, and so am I. I am willing to work here until 12 o'clock every night if necessary. But many Senators do not attend regularly, and I believe that we shall get more work done if we meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and work until 7 in the evening, and then go home and relax a little and get some of the cobwebs out of our minds so that we can come back the next morning and hold the Senate's nose to the grindstone. I believe that we shall do more work if we follow that procedure.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON, Would the Senator object to restricting his unanimous consent so that it would apply only to this week, because if we go ahead with the unanimous consent unlimited we may have to undo it by unanimous consent. It may be that next week we shall want to change the procedure. Why not make it apply to just this week?

Mr. CONNALLY. We are laboring now under a unanimous-consent agreement, working until 10 o'clock every night.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Mississippi mean to intimate that we are not going to finish the consideration of the pending bill this week?

Mr. HARRISON. It looks as if we will not.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to have the procedure I have suggested followed until we finish the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I would have no objection.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. My judgment is that the consideration of the bill will not be finished this week or next week. I have no objection to the Senate meeting at 9 o'clock and adjourning at 7 in the evening. I shall object to anything that proposes any shorter workday than one beginning at 9 o'clock.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator be willing to extend the time to 11 o'clock at night; that is, to meet at 9 in the morning and work until 11 at night?

Mr. ASHURST. I think we should do as we did in 1908, meet at 10 in the morning and adjourn at 10 at night. I am perfectly willing to agree to a unanimous-consent request to meet at 9 and adjourn at 7, or I will agree to meet at 9.30.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I modify the request, and ask that the Senate meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and remain in session until 7.30 at night. That will give the Senator from Arizona about the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the request preferred by the Senator from Texas to be that, beginning to-morrow, the Senate shall meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and remain in session until 7.30 o'clock in the evening. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the Senator from Texas if he will not modify his request so that speeches during the consideration of the bill shall be limited to 15 minutes?

Mr. CONNALLY. I can not do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I concur in the request made by the Senator from Texas. If the Senate will meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and continue in uninterrupted session until 7.30 in the evening, it is my conviction that more work will be accomplished and more results produced than under the present arrangement. I hope Senators will consent to that arrangement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is the unanimous-consent request so framed that it would bind the Senate during the entire remainder of this session of Congress?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood it was to apply only during the consideration of the pending measure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi that we should not bind ourselves during the entire period that this bill may be before the Senate. Why does not the Senator modify his request so as to provide for the balance of this week and let us try it out and see how it works?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if Senators are going to raise objections I shall have to withdraw my request because I can not make a separate request for each Senator present.

The "rest of the week" is only three more days. We would not accomplish a great deal if the agreement runs only for three days. I am willing to stay until 10 or 11 or 12 o'clock at night, but everyone knows we are not going to make any real progress at the night meetings. If we meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and Senators will remain here and give attention to business, we shall transact a great deal more business than is the case now. I renew the request that the Senate meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and remain in continuous session until 7.30 o'clock in the evening for the time that this bill is under consideration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator realizes that most of the time is taken up in speeches. I agree with him that at night, with large and well-filled galleries, we will sooner get rid of the speeches that will be made during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senator is wrong about that. We shall never get rid of the speeches if we undertake to respond to the suggestion the Senator is making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has renewed his request for a unanimous-consent agreement to provide that during the consideration of the pending measure the Senate shall meet each day at 10 o'clock in the morning and shall sit continuously until 7.30 o'clock in the evening. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD letters and statements protesting against additional taxes being levied on the automobile industry. These come from Fred Brenckman, representing the National Grange; from C. C. Cogswell, master of the Kansas State Grange, and from Chester H. Gray, representing the American Farm Bureau Federation. These protests reflect the opposition to a tax on motor vehicles which I find prevails quite generally among farm folks in the West. They believe that the automobile is a necessity and that the proposed tax would increase the cost to the consumer. They believe, too, that this is a field of taxation which belongs to the States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matters referred to are as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The fundamental reason why the National Grange is against the proposed taxes on automobiles, trucks, and accessories contained in the pending revenue bill is that this is a field of taxation which belongs to the States. There is much more involved in these proposed Federal taxes on motor vehicles than appears on the surface.

We have expended billions of dollars for the construction of improved highways, and by far the greater part of these roads have been built on borrowed money. The States and their minor subdivisions have issued bonds in this connection which must be met when they fall due. We have relied on the earning capacity of roads to retire these bonds, and the receipts from automobile license fees and gasoline tax have thus far provided the revenue to meet the sinking fund charges and interest on the bonds. If these sources of revenue should be dried up by prohibitive taxes on motor vehicles, the bonds would have to be paid just the same. Home owners and farmers may well view this situation with apprehension because in the final analysis they would have to pay for the staggering indebtedness we have incurred for improved roads.

The American Automobile Association recently released a statement showing that there was a drop of 731,178 in the registration of motor vehicles in 1931, as compared with 1930. While there was a loss in registration totals in 38 States, the heaviest drop occurred in States with a large agricultural population. In view of prevailing conditions, there can be no doubt that the tendency shown will be aggravated during the present year. There may be those who will say that if the farmer can not afford to have an automobile or a truck, he should walk. However, that brand of philosophy overlooks the point that the improved highways which have been constructed must be paid for, whether we use them or not. It will not help us in the solution of our tax problems if the Federal Government, in its efforts to balance the Budget, now invades a field of taxation which by every right belongs to the States.

If the proposed taxes on automobiles and accessories should be stricken from the bill, as we are convinced they should be, the question naturally arises as to where we are to look for the revenue which these proposed taxes are intended to produce. In his appearance before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and before the Finance Committee of the Senate, Secretary of the Treasury Mills suggested a tax of 7 per cent on the domestic consumption of gas and electricity; but if such a tax is to be levied, why should it be limited to domestic consumption?

According to figures furnished by the Federal Trade Commission, the total revenues of the electric power companies during the past year were $2,137,000,000; the value of the natural gas produced was $415,000,000; while the manufactured gas was valued at $521,000,000. This makes a total of $3,073,000,000. Three per cent on that sum would net more than $92,000,000. In our opinion, such a tax would be much more fair and equitable than the proposed special levies on motor vehicles.

It is gratifying to note that in taking steps to balance the Budget Congress is not depending on the levying of new taxes alone. Efficiency and economy are quite as necessary as additional taxes in meeting the financial situation with which the Government is confronted.

Yours very truly,

FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1932.

To the Members of the United States Senate:

GENTLEMEN: The proposed taxes on autos, trucks, and accessories in section 602 of H. R. 10236, should be eliminated from the measure, for three reasons:

(1) By increasing the delivered price of these commodities a sales resistance is created, which in times such as these will undoubtedly cause rather than cure unemployment. It is obvious that unemployment in an industry such as the automobile trade means a greatly lessened purchasing public for farm products.

(2) The sinking funds in States to retire road bonds and other funds to provide maintenance and construction costs depend mostly upon the large and continued use of motor vehicles and the consequent consumption of gasoline. For the Federal Government to enter the field of auto taxes is equivalent to depreciation of State road bonds, less effective maintenance of roads, slackening of highway construction, and eventually levying higher taxes on the general property to make up the deficits caused by shrinkages in auto revenues.

(3) Motor vehicles on farms are a necessity, not a luxury. Special taxes should be levied upon nonessential and luxury products, not upon necessities.

The recommendation of the American Farm Bureau Federation in regard to the proposed taxes on automobiles, trucks, and accessories is that all such taxes be eliminated.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION.
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

TOPEKA, KANS., May 16, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

FRIEND CAPPER: Am writing you to ask you to use your influence against the placing of any more tax on the users of automobiles. It seems that they are already paying proportionally more tax in this line than most any other, there being about a dozen different kinds of tax already levied on them.

I realize this is not a good place to add increased burdens but also feel that it is not the proper place for further additions. I also am aware that you have a stupendous task in balancing the Budget with any form of tax that will not have opposition, but feel that the automobile is already paying more than its just share.

Will be glad to have your reasons if your opinion in this matter is different from mine.

Thanking you for this as well as for past considerations, I am,

Cordially yours,

C. C. COGSWELL,
Master Kansas State Grange.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the pending amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The pending amendment is that of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], on page 247, to strike out lines 1 to 6, both inclusive, as follows:

(b) Other automobile chassis and bodies and motor cycles (including in each case parts or accessories therefor sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof), except tractors, 3 per cent. A sale of an automobile shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be considered to be a sale of the chassis and of the body.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have just voted $14,000,000 out of this section. Now we are asked to vote $44,000,000 more out. I sincerely hope and trust the Senate is not going to agree to it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah whether the new amendment on behalf of the committee relating to rubber is ready to be offered?

Mr. SMOOT. I am ready to offer it as soon as we reach that point in the bill, and I believe that will be very soon.

Mr. BULKLEY. Would not the Senator be willing to offer the amendment and let it be printed and lie over until to-morrow so Senators may understand it? It was proposed first to put an import tax on crude rubber, and now there is a substitution proposed to tax tires and tubes. I would like to have the Senate understand just what it is.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the amendment so the Senate can understand what it is. I propose to offer this amendment at the proper time:

Page 245, strike out lines 5 to 10, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 602. TAX ON TIRES AND INNER TUBES

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax at the following rates:

"(1) Tires wholly or in part of rubber, 2¼ cents a pound on total weight (exclusive of metal rims or rim bases), to be determined under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

"(2) Inner tubes (for tires) wholly or in part of rubber, 4 cents a pound on total weight, to be determined under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Inasmuch as the amendment will be printed in the RECORD in the morning, it will also be printed and lie on the table. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah to offer it as a substitute for lines 5 to 10, inclusive, on page 245.

Mr. SMOOT. That is where the amendment will come.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah if he would have any objection to putting the amendment in another place so it will be a part of the accessories tax? The reason why I suggest that is that with respect to the taxes on all other accessories except tires and tubes there are provisions on page 249 for refunds, and there is no reason why they should not apply to tires and tubes as well as other accessories.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read all the amendments to the Senator so he may see each one that will be offered to carry the proposal to completion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah is submitting for publication in the RECORD not only that portion of the amendment which he has just read, but also the compensatory duties to which he has referred as covering the four or five other features.

Mr. SMOOT. I can have them printed if the Senator from Ohio desires.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think it is important for the information of the Senate to have the whole situation in print so Senators may see in advance what they are required to vote upon. There are only a few Senators here who have heard the amendment read, and I do not want it voted on this evening, but rather have it go over until to-morrow, when everyone may understand it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio if he is opposed to the amendment that has been proposed by the committee?

Mr. BULKLEY. The amendment as proposed by the committee is not an impossible amendment. I think that the rates are still very high. I want the Senate to have every reasonable opportunity to know what the rates are and determine whether that is a proper tax to put upon tires and tubes.

Mr. HARRISON. I had understood that on two different occasions we had reduced the amount from the original plan. I thought perhaps the Senator would be able to support at least this amendment, but if the Senator opposes the amendment, there may be a fight the other way upon the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought this was all that the manufacturers themselves requested. We have already taken off millions of dollars from the bill. Now there is an amendment pending to take off $44,000,000, and I am sure the Senate is not going to do it.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator knows I only want to submit this to the fair judgment of the Senate. I will say to the Senator that the manufacturers themselves still feel that the amounts he is proposing are very high relative to other taxes. I appreciate the Senator has tried to be accommodating and fair and I do not question that at all, but frankly the taxes as proposed now are still high.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I send all the amendments to the desk and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BULKLEY. I would like to have printed in the RECORD a table showing what the proposed taxes, at the rates suggested by the Senator from Utah, will mean as applied to standard sizes of tires and tubes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Statement showing effect on dealers' business of proposed tax of 2¼ cents per pound on tires

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand the amendment as stated, it is to strike out all of the section relating to automobile chassis, bodies, and so forth; in other words, the section relating to passenger automobiles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the amendment to be to strike out the first six lines on page 247.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, we have already stricken out $14,000,000, and now it is proposed to strike out $44,000,000 more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. I renew my request for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Howell	Reed
Bankhead	Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Barkley	Dale	Jones	Sheppard
Bingham	Davis	Kendrick	Shortridge
Blaine	Dickinson	Keyes	Smith
Borah	Fess	King	Smoot
Bratton	Fletcher	La Follette	Steiwer
Brookhart	Frazier	Logan	Stephens
Broussard	George	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Bulow	Hale	Metcalf	Tydings
Byrnes	Harrison	Moses	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Carey	Hatfield	Norris	Walcott
Cohen	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Connally	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Coolidge	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I transfer it to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair which I made a while ago, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], but I am informed that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRNES. I am paired with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not being advised as to how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] with the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—18

Bankhead	Coolidge	Logan	Tydings
Bulkley	Couzens	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Bulow	Hawes	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hull	Smith
Cohen	Johnson	Trammell

NAYS—52

Ashurst	Borah	Cutting	Frazier
Bailey	Bratton	Dale	George
Barbour	Broussard	Davis	Gore
Barkley	Carey	Dickinson	Hale
Bingham	Connally	Fess	Harrison
Blaine	Copeland	Fletcher	Hastings

Hatfield	La Follette	Pittman	Steiwer
Hayden	McGill	Reed	Stephens
Hebert	McNary	Robinson, Ark.	Thomas, Idaho
Howell	Metcalf	Robinson, Ind.	Wagner
Kendrick	Moses	Sheppard	Walcott
Keyes	Norris	Shortridge	Watson
King	Nye	Smoot	Wheeler

NOT VOTING—26

Austin	Glass	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Glenn	Morrison	Townsend
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Neely	Walsh, Mont.
Byrnes	Jones	Patterson	Waterman
Caraway	Kean	Schall	White
Costigan	Lewis	Shipstead
Dill	Long	Swanson

So Mr. VANDENBERG's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 247, line 7, after the word "accessories," to insert "(other than tires and inner tubes)."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I presume I shall have to ask that that amendment go over, although I thought when I was asked a question about it it would not be necessary. However, I shall have to ask that it go over, because as to tires and inner tubes there are about four or five amendments that will have to be made if changes are made in one or two of the other amendments. So I shall have to ask that that amendment go over to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. The clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. My suggestion applies to all items affecting tires and inner tubes. We may, however, vote on the amendment in line 9, where the committee proposes to strike out 1 per cent and to insert 2 per cent. I want the other amendments, however, to go over because of the fact that their adoption finally will depend upon the wording of other provisions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments referred to by the Senator from Utah will be passed over, and the question is now on agreeing to the amendment which the Secretary will state.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 247, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "1 per cent" and insert "2 per cent."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in view of the obvious attitude of the Senate toward the entire elimination of these paragraphs, I shall not offer my substitute at this point to strike out all of subsection (c); but I suggest to the Senate that in voting upon the committee amendment the obvious logic of the situation now requires the defeat of the committee amendment in order to keep the tax upon accessories of automobiles in line with the tax upon trucks and passenger cars.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to understand that to disagree to the committee amendment will mean a reduction in the estimated revenue of four and one-half million dollars. The rate of 2 per cent on the accessories of automobiles is entirely reasonable. It is lower than the tax on automobiles themselves. I can see no reason whatsoever for disagreeing to the amendment that has been reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it seems to be necessary for me to respond to the arithmetic that has just been submitted to the Senate. The Senator from Utah has twice referred to the same statistics from the same source in connection with the preceding section. The Senators are quoting figures submitted by the Treasury Department which are arrived at upon a basis which I can not possibly conceive or understand. Based upon actual automobile sales for 1932 the total revenue from all these three sections of the automobile tax, instead of being $73,000,000 as estimated by the Treasury, will be but $29,500,000. Based upon as large sales in 1932 as were made in 1931, the total tax will be only $50,000,000, instead of $73,000,000. How a proposed receipt of $73,000,000 can be figured from this source is entirely beyond my comprehension.

Therefore, Mr. President, I submit that there is no such loss impending through the defeat of these committee amendments as has been indicated. On the contrary, while the Treasury estimates indicate a receipt of $9,000,000 from the tax on accessories, the receipts based upon the actual trade for this year will only be three and a half million dollars, and the loss to the Treasury, through the defeat of the committee amendment, instead of being the figure which the Senator from Pennsylvania indicates, in my judgment, based upon the actual business of the present year, will be less than $1,000,000; and the rejection of the amendment is necessary to bring the accessories in line with the taxes proposed in the other two sections.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if that be true, then it is all the more necessary that the 2 per cent rate be fixed instead of the 1 per cent rate. Of course, I can not say whether the Treasury estimate is correct or not, but all the Treasury estimates are based upon the best information that can be obtained from the statistics in the department.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is not the best information available the actual sales for 1931 and the sales thus far for 1932? What could be better information upon which to base a calculation than that?

Mr. SMOOT. Granting that is so, then we at least ought to have the 2 per cent rate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now the Senator is talking about something else. I am talking about what the figures, based on actual business, show will be the extent of the loss.

Mr. SMOOT. Even if the estimates are wrong, we ought to have the 2 per cent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator's argument is based upon the fact that the estimates of the department are wrong, I have not much to say about it.

Mr. HAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just for a question?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me perfectly obvious that the Treasury in preparing its estimates has taken into account not only the reduced business of 1931 and the total prostration of business for the first quarter of this year but it has probably also assumed that if we have the courage to balance the Budget business will pick up, and so the estimate which the department gives us is the composite of all the factors which it is expected will govern business during the next two fiscal years.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to do so, in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, let me observe that if the Treasury is optimistic enough to contemplate such a substantial increase in the automobile business during the next year, it will be exceedingly unfortunate if the Senate proceeds to vote a tax that will make any such recovery impossible by any stretch of the imagination.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, coming from a State that probably makes more automobile accessories than any other State in the Union, I address my remarks to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

This section covers tires, inner tubes, spark plugs——

Mr. SMOOT. But tires and inner tubes are excepted, Mr. President.

Mr. BULKLEY. Has not that amendment been passed over?

Mr. SMOOT. It has; also the same amendment that appears in two or three other places in the bill.

Mr. HAWES. All right; it covers storage batteries, leaf springs, tire chains, and so forth.

I should like to ask the junior Senator from Michigan if any automobile can run if any of these things are out of order or defective?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, unfortunately, some of them sometimes try to run in that condition; and a tax of this nature will be an encouragement to precisely that type of transportation on our highways.

Mr. HAWES. Whenever they do run they endanger the life of everybody on the highway?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us pay to put them in, then.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I just want to make one comment upon the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that the Treasury Department, in making the estimates for the revenue to be obtained from the automobile tax, predicated them on an increase in business, and therefore got the estimates high to justify the tax. I submit, however, that when we were discussing income-tax rates the estimates were all substantially lowered, and they did not anticipate any revenues in 1932 because of the depressed condition of business. Now they reverse the situation when they want a tax applied, and take a different position when they do not want a tax applied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—38

Ashurst	Dickinson	Hebert	Reed
Bailey	Fess	Howell	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Fletcher	Jones	Sheppard
Barkley	George	Kendrick	Shortridge
Bingham	Gore	King	Smoot
Bratton	Hale	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Harrison	McGill	Watson
Carey	Hastings	McNary	Wheeler

NOT VOTING—24

Austin	Glenn	McKellar	Swanson
Black	Goldsborough	Morrison	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Hull	Neely	Townsend
Caraway	Kean	Patterson	Wagner
Costigan	Lewis	Schall	Waterman
Glass	Long	Shipstead	White

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire at this time to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to strike out the paragraph on automobiles was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 248, after line 4, to insert:

(d) Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, the tax under subsection (a) shall not apply in the case of sales of bodies by the manufacturer, producer, or importer to a manufacturer or producer of automobile trucks or other automobiles to be sold by such vendee. For the purposes of subsection (a) such vendee shall be considered the manufacturer or producer of such bodies.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to perfect that amendment. It is all right as it is, with the exception that in line 7, and again in line 10, after the letter "(a)," there should be inserted "or (b)," so that it will refer to two instead of one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment, as modified, will be agreed to. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 248, after line 12, to insert:

(e) (1) Where prior to August 1, 1934, any article subject to the tax imposed by this section has been sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, and is on such date held by a dealer and intended for sale, there shall be refunded to the manufacturer, producer, or importer the amount of the tax, or if the tax has not been paid, the tax shall be abated.

(2) As used in this subsection the term "dealer" includes a wholesaler, jobber, or distributor. For the purposes of this subsection, an article shall be considered as "held by a dealer" if title thereto has passed to such dealer (whether or not delivery to him has been made), and if for purposes of consumption title to such article or possession thereof has not at any time been transferred to any person other than a dealer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

BOULDER CANYON DAM

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to speak about a matter which is probably a little foreign to this amendment.

At the time that we had the Interior Department appropriation bill before the Senate, it was admitted by the Senator in charge of the bill, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that it would be necessary to carry an additional appropriation in the first deficiency appropriation bill for the Boulder Canyon project.

I did not intend to discuss that matter, but some uneasiness has arisen with regard to the situation, and possibly some misunderstanding. I have made inquiry of the members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives. The Secretary of the Interior has written a letter, not only to the Committee on Appropriations of the House, of which I have a copy, but to others, in which he states that unless approximately $10,000,000 additional is carried in the deficiency appropriation bill, the Government will stand to lose about $6,000,000, more or less.

I wish to state that the Government will lose, in my opinion, more than $6,000,000 if that appropriation is not made. That is the minimum. If destruction takes place during the year on that project, we may lose $20,000,000.

That is one of the projects referred to in the Wagner bill, discussed to-day, as a self-liquidating project. As a matter of fact, it is a capital-investment proposition. The Hoover dam will probably live 200 years. That, and the power house, will cost $55,000,000. It is an essentially unbusinesslike proposition to carry such appropriations in the current expenses of the Government. Yet that is being done.

The bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] provides that this $10,000,000 may be lifted right out of that appropriation, and carried under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Whether that bill or some other bill shall be enacted, such appropriations will be carried in some legislation.

The Department of the Interior estimated that $12,000,000 would be required this year for the Boulder Dam. The Bureau of the Budget, in its desire for economy, cut that to $10,000,000. The House, in its further desire for economy, cut it to $8,000,000. This body, in its excitement with regard to economy, cut it to $6,000,000.

We are face to face with a matter of contract. All of the power to be generated at that dam has been sold in advance. The contract for the construction has been signed, and obligations are due under the contract. The Government realized it could save millions of dollars by hastening that project, besides saving the risk of much destruction of life. It put a large penalty if they did not finish within seven years. They are prepared to complete it within that time.

More money will be required during this year than will be required during any other year. There are four enormous tunnels to divert the Colorado River in that canyon, which can divert it only in times of low water.

If they do not divert the water next fall, they will not be able to divert it for a year, and the whole force will have to be laid off; there will be thousands of idle men, with chances for destruction of the property and loss to the Government, according to the Secretary of the Interior, of $6,000,000 as the minimum amount, and what the contractors may claim for the breaking up of their organizations we do not know.

I am credibly informed that reports which have now been made, and which could have been made when the Budget estimates were first presented, show the facts to be as I have stated them. Congress must put $10,000,000 into the deficiency appropriation bill or stand to let the Government lose $6,000,000 or more and have 4,000 men discharged and an organization broken up for a year.

I have heard criticism of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives. I want to say now that there is no justification for that. There is not a bit of justification for such criticism. There is no opposition from the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

This is the trouble: The original Budget message did not carry estimates for the necessary funds. The Committee on Appropriations of the House stated that they would not go above the Budget estimate, and they will not go above them. It is essential to go above the estimate originally sent in by the Budget if existing conditions are to be met. The Secretary of the Interior has made his estimates, showing that $10,000,000 more is required, but the Bureau of the Budget has not acted. The bill may come out of the Committee on Appropriations any day with that item not included.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. PITTMAN. One moment. The Budget may be working on it now. I do not know. I hope they are. I only rose to defend the Committee on Appropriations of the House. They will have to report out the bill without that appropriation in it unless an estimate comes from the Budget.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not conceive of Congress adjourning at this session without making an appropriation of at least $10,000,000, and it is actually estimated that nearer $11,000,000 will be required to carry on the work referred to by the Senator from Nevada. That work can not be stopped without a loss to the Government, and no one can tell whether the amount required will be ten million or twenty million.

I am quite sure, as I said before, that when the facts are brought to the attention of the Director of the Budget the estimate will be sent up; and, indeed, I think he will be directed to send an estimate to cover the necessary amount. But I do not want to see Congress adjourn until the appropriation is made to carry on that great work.

If there were not the pressing necessity, I would say that if the work could be put off we should put it off. But it can not be put off without not only the loss of a year's work but the disorganization of a whole town, a force of 4,000 men, scattered over a wide territory. The work could not be stopped without bringing about that disastrous result.

That is only a part of the picture. As the Senator has said, the water this year will be higher than it has been for years. In some of the mountains in the eastern part of our State the waters go into the Green River and then into the Colorado. For years we have had only about 2 or 3 feet of snow in those mountains. This year we have had 14 or 15 feet of snow. What does that mean? It means, more than likely, that the water will be out of the banks just as soon as the first hot spell comes. That condition prevails clear down to the Boulder Dam. There are the tunnels to which the Senator has referred, if you can call them such, to carry off the water.

The work must not cease; that is all.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Nevada referred to the action of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate in reducing the item $2,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. I think it should be said that when the committee took that action it was stated repeatedly, and concurred in by every member of the committee, that the deficiency appropriation bill must carry an item sufficient in amount to carry on the work effectively and uninterruptedly.

Mr. SMOOT. That was understood by every member of the committee.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Utah was a member of the committee, and I was a member of the committee, and I think every one of us concurred in the view that the deficiency bill must carry enough money to permit the work to go forward without interruption.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee was so positive that that would be done that, in the extreme condition which existed, in order to take from the appropriation bill about $10,000,000 on account of the 10 per cent reduction ordered by the Senate, they did take $2,000,000 from the House provision for this work. But it was stated on the floor of the Senate that it was distinctly understood that that was done in order to meet the request made of the committee, and that any one who knew the situation would agree that the money must be appropriated.

Mr. BRATTON. It was stated not only on the floor of the Senate, but it was stated in the committee, that we made the cut in obedience to the resolution, but every member of the committee committed himself definitely to the proposition that the money must be provided in the deficiency bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would go so far, if there were not an estimate from the Budget, as to ask unanimous consent from this body, when the bill was reported in the Senate, that that item go into it. I recognize that it could not go in without unanimous consent, but that is what I would do, and I suppose every other Senator who knows the situation would feel the same way.

Mr. BRATTON. As one member of the committee, I never would have consented to the cut except for the definite understanding that we were doing it in obedience to the resolution of the Senate, and confidently expected an estimate from the Budget to go into the deficiency bill. Otherwise the proposal would not have had my approval.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we were under obligations in the Committee on Appropriations to make a cut. It has been said time and time again on the floor that that system of an arbitrary cut of 10 per cent in the appropriations in each bill was so unscientific that it must lead us into just such errors as this.

I have no doubt but that when the economy subcommittee makes its report, and brings to us a list of economies which can be exercised all through the operations of the Government, we may take this bill referred to to-night and make the appropriation necessary to go on with the work.

Anybody who knows anything about the Boulder Dam knows that it would be a crime not to do this summer that particular part of the work which is necessary at the time when the river is low before a flood comes which might interfere with the work for two or three years.

The committee labored under the lash of an action of the Senate which, to my mind, was a very unscientific and wrong way of dealing with this problem of economy. Every one of us wants economy, but we can not get it and not work hardships if we have to do it under such arbitrary cuts as the committee was forced to make in these circumstances.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not want it to be inferred that I was criticizing the Senate committee or the House committee. I really rose to defend the House committee against some misunderstandings. I know that the House committee now understands this question and realizes that it is essential that this appropriation be made in order to carry out the contract. We have contracted to pay approximately $55,000,000 to the Six Companies. The Six Companies are interested in the time when that contract is completed, provided the Government will carry out its contract, and if it does not carry out its contract the Government will lose. In reality there will be twice as much money expended in the ensuing year as in any other year until the dam is completed. They can not divert the water of that river in that narrow canyon except at extreme low water. To do that they must build cofferdams, one just below the upper end of the tunnels and one just above the lower end. That is to turn the entire river through the four tunnels, 50 feet in diameter, which could carry the whole Mississippi River at normal flow where it passes St. Louis.

Senators can imagine what the flow would be there at high water. They have to pile all the labor they can gather to build the two diversion dams at low water so that they can sink 125 feet down into the bedrock for a base, for 600 feet up and down the stream, 250 feet at the base, and a thousand feet at the top.

That work has to be done. The Committee on Appropriations of the House can not make the appropriation without a supplemental estimate, and they will not; and I do not blame them.

Our Committee on Appropriations have gotten to the point where they are keeping within the Budget estimates, and if the Budget estimates were small originally by reason of a lack of knowledge of the construction problem, or by reason of a hope that they intended to make a supplemental estimate, the additional appropriation should be made, and I have no doubt an estimate is in progress of preparation at this time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Has the work on the Boulder Dam slowed up any?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not a bit.

Mr. JONES. That is good. I felt satisfied it would continue just as rapidly as possible, but I just wondered whether from the fact that we did not appropriate all the money needed the work had slowed up any. I do not see any reason why it should slow up.

Mr. PITTMAN. They will quit on approximately the 1st day of October, unless they have these additional funds to work it.

Mr. JONES. They should get the appropriation.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment, and Mr. SMOOT submitted several amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE RELATION OF WAGE CUTTING TO UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a speech of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, on the relation of wage cutting to unemployment.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF WILLIAM GREEN, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

In the existing national emergency all groups have suffered and all classes of people have been forced to face grave, difficult problems. Values have been destroyed, many fortunes have vanished, a large number of people who were considered wealthy have been made comparatively poor while millions of working people have been forced into idleness, which necessitated the depletion of their meager savings. It seems inconceivable that such a distressing economic change could have taken place within the borders of such a favored land as our own within the short space of three years.

The forces of depression have been waging war against the economic, financial, and industrial agencies of the Nation. They have been relentless in their attacks. The people have been their victims. No one has escaped. All have felt, perhaps in varying degrees, the destructive effect of the effective assaults which these invisible forces have delivered upon our social and economic order. When economic suffering is universal, applying to the Nation in a general way, comprehending all classes of people, kinship becomes a more vital reality, and complete recovery becomes a matter of common concern to all.

An appreciation of the seriousness of the situation has inspired the representatives of the Government and of all organized social groups to resist actively these forces which have imposed such widespread suffering and distress upon society. It is commonly understood that if the people are to conquer and normal conditions are to be restored, practical and constructive methods must be employed. We must demonstrate that human resourcefulness, genius, and courage are able to overcome, control, and master economic conditions which prevail.

There is a distinguishing difference in the tragic effect of the long-continued depression upon those who have suffered because of impairment in financial values and those who have been forced, because of unemployment, to exist upon a mere subsistence level. It is bad enough to sustain financial losses, but it is infinitely worse to be deprived of food and to suffer from the experiences of hunger and want. Dwindling bank accounts may arouse feelings of disappointment and regret, but the sight of his children starving will drive a man to desperation.

We must prepare to meet the social consequences of such a tragic situation if we permit it to continue indefinitely. For this reason we must face the situation heroically. If we have been engaging in wrong practices, we must stop them. The structure of our Government, built as it is upon the ideals of democracy, will not permanently withstand the assaults made upon it by an unsound economic system. The perpetuation of our form of government and the preservation of our governmental institutions depend very largely upon the social contentment and well-being of the masses of the people. In the light of these facts it is incomprehensible that the legislative bodies of the Nation would contribute to the state of social unrest either through failure to do their duty or through the enactment of unsound and unwise legislation.

The immediate problem is to place men and women now idle at work in the industrial establishments and business enterprises of the Nation, thus restoring to them their buying power and reviving markets which have been dormant for the past three years. Any avoidable increase in unemployment at this time would be most deplorable. This policy should be supplemented by a fixed and determined effort to maintain the existing diminished purchasing power of those who are employed, using that as a basis upon which to rebuild our shattered economic structure.

There can be no resumption of industrial activity in any section of the country until a demand has been created for manufactured goods. This demand must be predicated upon human needs and buying power. There must be a market before goods can be manufactured or sold. We know that the basis of our economic distress is found in the fact that buying and consuming power has been very largely destroyed. The mechanical equipment of industry, approximating the point of perfection, means nothing if there is no market for manufactured goods. The wheels of industry will remain silent and invested capital will have no earning power so long as the men and women who labor are idle and unable to buy.

Labor has long understood that if the buying power of the masses of the people were constantly reduced through the imposition of wage reductions unemployment would increase, social distress would prevail, and industry would suffer.

Labor firmly believes that wage cutting means the underwriting of the depression. Wage cutting is like bloodletting. It leaves the patient weakened and exhausted. It is amazing that many industrial leaders adhere to the primitive policy of wage cutting as a remedy for industrial ills. They persist in the application of this policy notwithstanding the facts and the records show that each succeeding wage reduction places the living standards and the consuming power of the masses of the people upon a lower level.

In the pursuit of this unsound policy they do not seem to take into account the fact that the volume of goods produced and sold must shrink in an amount exceeding the size of the wage reduction imposed. This is understood when the psychological effect which follows the imposition of reductions in wages is appreciated. Fear of another wage reduction and the creation of a lack of confidence causes people to husband their resources, to economize, and to hoard savings. Buying power is frozen when wages go down and consuming power increases when wages go up and commodity prices increase. The excuse offered by some economists who support industrial leaders in the pursuit of a wage-cutting policy is that a reduction in commodity prices, with a corresponding increase in the purchasing power of the dollar, justifies such action. They advance the theory that cheap prices, cheap labor, with lowered standards of living, make for prosperity. Furthermore, they indicate their belief that the American standard of living, which must be commensurate with the requirements of American citizenship, should be based upon the shifting and changing value of the purchasing power of the dollar.

Labor refuses to accept this principle of economic philosophy. It knows from experience that it is unsound and, in application, most demoralizing.

The sale of manufactured goods and the volume of business has always followed the declining value of the contents of the pay envelope.

During the 2½-year period following the stock-market collapse of 1929 the incomes of the workers have been reduced 50 per cent. In February, 1932, wage payments to workers in factories and on railroads were just one-half of the 1929 average. The cost of living has decreased to some extent, but not sufficient to compensate for this loss. While workers have suffered a loss amounting to 50 cents out of each dollar, the decline in prices has saved them only 18 cents. Workers need 82 cents to-day to buy $1 worth of living costs, but they only have 50 cents with which to buy it. Accounting for both the decline in prices and wage losses, workers' incomes now, in the terms of the goods bought, are 39 per cent below the 1929 level. During February, 1932, sales to consumers were 30 per cent below the 1929 average. These facts are the best answer that can be given to the theory advanced by some economists that the increasing purchasing power of the dollar offsets the forced reductions imposed upon wage earners.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Many of the reasons assigned for the imposition of reductions in wages in private industry do not apply to the Government or to employees of the Government. The competitive argument can not apply nor can the alleged sheer necessities claimed by private employers, as a justification for reductions in wage earners' pay, apply to the Federal Government. In fact, the savings which would accrue to the Treasury of the United States as a result of pay cuts imposed upon Federal workers would be comparatively inconsequential.

It may be possible to limit and curtail private industry and to completely destroy it through ruinous competition and wage reductions, but such a condition must not and can not be brought about in the administration of the affairs of government. The Government can very properly reduce expenses through the elimination of wasteful processes and duplication of effort and through the pursuit of wise economic policies and efficient planning and statesmanship, but it dare not imperil the basic work of the Government or the orderly functioning of the various branches of the Government. Efficiency and a high morale, on the part of Government employees, are valuable factors which should be preserved and encouraged in order to guarantee the maintenance of the administrative work of the Government upon a high and serviceable plane. These valuable attributes can not be preserved if Government workers are forced to forego the enjoyment of living standards which have been progressively erected through years of effort and service.

Many who have not given special study to the salaries and the classes of services of Government employees entertain the opinion that they are well paid and that they belong to a favored class of employees. They do not realize that for the past 30 years the increases in the earnings of Government employees have not kept pace with increases in earnings of employees of private industries. Listed among Government employees are many professional men, scientists, doctors, engineers, lawyers, and highly specialized groups of men and women who are entitled, by virtue of their learning, their zeal, and their fitness to give service, to receive a salary commensurate with that paid by private industry. The high quality of this type of service is recognized by industry, but the Government pays less for such work than non-Government employers.

As the grade of work performed advances and the years of experience mount up the differential becomes greater, due to the failure to increase wages and salaries. At the present time the differential is so great that if it were not for the fact that these public-minded groups were willing to make great personal sacrifices the Government would not be able to keep them in its employ. Their minds are attuned to their work and they naturally are willing to balance their hope of financial gain with the feeling of security of position and salary which their position has always held. It will be difficult for the Government to hold such exceptional men if this sense of security is destroyed. In this group about one employee in every four received $2,200 or more, but less than $5,000 per year.

Referring to the largest and most notoriously underpaid group, it is astonishing to note that in the three-fourths of a million civil employees of the Government only 3 in 500 receive $5,000 or more per year. This includes the members of the President's Cabinet, Assistant Secretaries, and bureau chiefs. In contrast, about one in six Government employees receives less than $1,000 a year, or $20 per week, and three out of every four receive less than $2,200 a year, or $43 per week.

It can readily be seen that in order to make any substantial reduction in the amount of the Government pay roll it will be necessary to draw the reduction from those least able to pay it. A 10 per cent cut in salaries above $2,700 will only reduce the civil pay roll about 1½ per cent and will only reduce the total expenditures about one-third of 1 per cent.

The Federal Budget can not be balanced by a reduction in salaries alone. Many acts will be necessary to balance the Budget. There are certain expenditures which can not be curtailed, but there are many avenues open for ways of economy. These avenues should be pursued and the attempts to force a reduction in wages upon the underpaid group of Government employees should be abandoned.

The proposed cuts of salaries of Federal employees will not reduce the direct taxes of the farmer, the small business man, and the laborer. It is estimated that over half the national income arises from income and profit taxes. The average man contributes to this amount through a series of petty taxes such as are imposed upon tobacco, on automobile sales, on some forms of amusement and club activities, and many other nonessential items of living expense. Ninety-seven per cent of our people pay no Federal income tax and any reduction in their tax burden must come through a reduction of State and local taxes.

The Budget can be balanced without resorting to wage cutting by the Federal Government. Our Country is great and resourceful. Any cut in wages which might be imposed would not affect, to any perceptible degree, the balancing of the Budget. Failure to accomplish the balancing of the Budget would not be the greatest calamity which could be experienced by the Government. The prevention of social unrest and industrial discontent and the preservation and safeguarding of human life are objectives far more worthy and necessary than balancing the Budget at this time.

The greatest task of the Government, one which transcends all others in importance, is to provide work for the unemployed, to relieve existing human distress and to restore the faith and confidence of the American people in American business, in the financial institutions of our Nation, and in the integrity of the Government and its ability to govern wisely and for the best good of all the people. A return to normal conditions depends upon the development and application of sound, wise, constructive policies.

Wage cutting must cease and the people must be assured that it is at an end if buying power is to be restored and business is to be revived. The time is here when the leadership of the Nation, both in private industry and in governmental affairs, must speak out, assuring the people that all our concentrated economic, industrial, and governmental power will be utilized in an effort to stop the decline in wage-earners' incomes and in commodity prices. Such a declaration would have a most profound effect upon the mental attitude of all the people. They would feel that the end of depression's war had been reached. The psychology of hope would be substituted for one of despair. With the preservation of wage standards set for Government employees and the adjustments in working time in private industry made necessary through the introduction of mechanical devices, our Nation will return to normal conditions and assume and maintain the supreme position it has always held in the industrial world.

THE FARM PROBLEM—DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT PLAN

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the agricultural relief bill reported favorably from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, is the so-called three-way plan and has the indorsement of all farm organizations.

It provides three methods by which the Farm Board may operate to give the American farmer an American price for that part of his products which are consumed in this country—and most of them are—

(1) The board may put the equalization fee into effect; or

(2) It may invoke the debenture feature; or

(3) It may put into effect an allotment plan.

The latter has been very little discussed and is not well understood. The main advantage claimed for the allotment plan is that it will automatically control production, because the producer will get an American price only for that part of his products which are for domestic consumption.

Of late there has been a fuller realization of the fact that the agricultural problem is the underlying difficulty of our whole economic depression, which has been aggravated by the causes. This has led to a study of the different plans proposed in a desire to bring about that which is best.

The main objection to the 3-way plan now pending is that it is not mandatory, only optional. There are different plans proposed which improve the allotment feature of same.

Mr. President, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD an explanation of another domestic allotment plan, by W. R. Ronald, of Mitchell, S. Dak., publisher of the Mitchell Republican. Mr. Ronald is a member of a committee of five appointed at a recent meeting held at Chicago whose purpose it is to bring before the public the merits of this plan.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT PLAN

W. R. Ronald, of Mitchell, S. Dak., member of a committee chosen at a Chicago conference to promote the domestic allotment plan to make the tariff effective on farm products of which there is an exportable surplus, spoke as follows at a luncheon attended by various Members of the Senate and House of Representatives:

"The idea of the domestic allotment plan was first suggested by the late Doctor Spillman, of the United States Department of Agriculture, in 1926. In 1929 Prof. John D. Black, of Harvard University, who is also chief economist of the Federal Farm Board, wrote in his collegiate capacity a book entitled 'Agricultural Reform in the United States,' in which he devoted a chapter to the allotment plan of making the tariff effective on home consumption of farm products of which there is an exportable surplus. He developed the idea considerably from the form in which Doctor Spillman presented it.

"In the past two years Prof. M. L. Wilson, head of the department of agricultural economics of the Montana State College, Bozeman, Mont., made some 50 addresses to meetings of farmers, at each of which he explained the four different plans of making the tariff work for the farmer or, at least, improve domestic prices—stabilization, the equalization fee, the export debenture, and the allotment plan. He attempted to make no case for any of them, but in each meeting the farmers declared emphatically for the allotment plan. As a result, the Montana State Farm Bureau at its last meeting indorsed the proposal.

"In consequence of this, Vice President Stockton, of the Montana State Farm Bureau, invited a number of those who had become interested in the plan to attend a conference at Chicago to discuss it. This group indorsed the principles of the plan and named a committee composed of M. L. Wilson, chairman; E. H. Harriman, of Boston, Mass. (newly elected president of the United States Chamber of Commerce); Louis S. Clark, of Omaha, president of the Mortgage Investors' Association of Nebraska; Henry A. Wallace, editor of Wallace's Farmer, of Des Moines, Iowa; R. R. Rogers, of Newark, N. J.; and W. R. Ronald, editor of the Mitchell (S. Dak.) Evening Republican, and instructed the committee to complete a bill for introduction into Congress. Following this, Mr. Wilson spent some two weeks in Washington and New York and presented the plan to a considerable number who have opposed all other farm price measures, including some high in official and business life, and found general approval of the plan for the reason that, unlike all others, it prevents any increase in acreage or production of products benefited but actually makes possible positive reduction of them when found desirable.

"This bill is not to be understood as being in conflict with the measure now in Congress supported by the three farm organizations, inasmuch as it would accomplish all the objects of the present and proposed law, and more, as follows:

First. It would bring about real stabilization with corresponding benefits to markets, and do it without cost to the Federal Treasury.

Second. It would accomplish all that is proposed by the equalization fee and more, because it would make the full amount of the tariff (instead of just a fraction of it) effective on the entire domestic consumption.

Third. It would accomplish all that is proposed by the export debenture, and more, because, as a subsidy it would apply not partially but wholly, and not just on the exports but on the home consumption, producing several times as much for the farmer as the export debenture.

Fourth. It is an elaboration and development of the allotment plan proposed in the third section of the measure introduced by the farm organizations, not only making it effective and positive in action, but rendering it apparently constitutional beyond all doubt and altogether self-financing.

This plan differs from the 3-way proposal of the farm organizations in that it would be mandatory upon the Farm Board to put it into operation as to any commodity once the specified percentage of those engaged in the production of the commodity in question should vote or petition the Farm Board to do so.

In the completion of the bill to be presented to Congress, many suggestions have been received from many sources, but the committee is fully aware that it will be perfected in its consideration by Congress. In the outline it will give you I will present the measure as it now stands, with a number of points recognized as subject to further consideration.

When 60 per cent of the producers or production of any one of the farm commodities of which there is now a surplus—wheat, cotton, hogs, tobacco, and rice—is presented to the Farm Board, it shall proceed to apply the allotment plan to the production of that farm product. (Provision is made for extension to other farm products in the discretion of the Farm Board.)

The Farm Board will have records of individual production for the last five years in the vote or petition submitted. From crop reporting figures the Farm Board will proceed to allot the amount of the domestic consumption of the wheat or cotton or tobacco or rice to the various producing States in proportion to their average production for five years. Thus, if it is found that the annual domestic consumption of wheat, for example, is 500,000,000 bushels, and South Dakota had averaged 5 per cent of the total wheat production of the country, South Dakota will be allotted 25,000,000 bushels on which the tariff-adjustment fee would be paid.

Thereupon a State allotment commission of seven members would be named by the governor of each State, and this would allot the State allotment to the various counties in proportion to their production in the last preceding five years. The State commission would select a county commission, which allots the county's share to the individual farmers in proportion to their average acreage in the past five years (or in proportion to their average production, as may be decided).

Thereupon each farmer for whom an allotment has been made may secure from the county commission his allotment certificates, but on condition that he sign an application or contract in which he will agree to abide by conditions imposed. One of the conditions which the Farm Board may insert in this contract is a provision that the farmer shall not increase his acreage or one that he shall decrease it by any per cent determined by the Farm Board, or that he may increase it by any per cent specified by the board. This contract, voluntarily entered into by the farmer, is a most important feature of this plan; in fact, the heart of it. Because it is voluntary it is constitutional. Because no farmer would be likely to pass up the tariff benefits allotted him, he would gladly enter into the contract. However, there is no obligation upon him to do so. He would have no objection to a horizontal reduction in acreage, because he would know all others were doing the same; in fact, he would rejoice because of the prospect of improved prices as a result of so effective a procedure to do away with overproduction and consequently disastrous prices. The contract would be observed, if the penalty proposed is imposed, that of loss of allotment rights.

The Federal Farm Board is authorized to declare a charge (really an excise tax) upon the manufacture or processing or slaughtering of any of farm products named, the charge to be protected by establishment of a corresponding duty on the raw product, and compensatory duties and regulations for their applications upon all manufactures in order that processors and manufacturers may be fully protected up to the full amount of the excise tax as it may increase their costs. This charge (excise tax) may be imposed by the Farm Board either at the time of processing or at the time of sale as it may determine to be the more equitable. A drawback will be paid on all exports of processed or manufactured product. The Internal Revenue Bureau will collect the tax and make the necessary regulations therefor. A special revolving fund of the proceeds will be set up in the United States Treasury out of which to pay the tariff adjustment fees to the farmers.

The amount of the charge (excise tax) proposed for the five farm products named to receive tariff benefits from the outset are: 42 cents per bushel on wheat, 5 cents per pound on cotton, 3 cents per pound on hogs, 5 cents per pound on tobacco, and a half a cent on rice. The amount of the charge (and tariff) on each commodity shall be subject to change from time to time.

To assist it in determining the reasonableness of any of the tariffs, the Farm Board, it is proposed, shall include in the contract with individual farmers an agreement to keep a record of costs if called upon to do so. The Farm Board shall specify a certain number in each county, probably five, to be selected by the county allotment commission, to keep this record of costs on standard simplified forms worked out by the Farm Board with the assistance of agricultural colleges. These records shall keep, first, the cost of products of the soil, and, secondly, by-products, such as livestock, dairy products, poultry, etc., distributing overhead in proportion to the total value of each item of production. Included in the cost it is suggested the following be included:

1. Interest on the principal at 5 per cent; the principal to be not less than (a) twice the farm-mortgage indebtedness, or (b) the pre-war actual price of the land increased by the percentage of increase in prices of nonagricultural commodities in the period from 1922 to 1932 as compared with 1909 to 1914.

2. Actual depreciation on buildings, equipment, and machinery.

3. Wages for all time necessarily consumed in the operation of farm by all employees, including the farmer and members of his family, at rates for unskilled labor.

If, upon compilation of these actual costs, the Farm Board shall find, over a reasonable period, that tariffs are too low, it shall recommend increases in them to the Tariff Commission; if it finds that they are too high, in justice to the consumer, it shall recommend decreases.

At the conclusion of the allotment year, or semiannually, as may be specified, the Farm Board shall ascertain the amount received by the Federal Treasury from the tax—tariff-adjustment charge—on each product. It shall deduct therefrom the total expense of administration of the plan with reference to the commodity. The amount remaining shall be prorated among the individual farmers holding allotment certificates.

The allotment certificates are made discountable at the Federal reserve banks. In the case of crops the farmer will have performed his part of the contract when he sows or plants not to exceed the specified number of acres. Thus the certificates will operate as crop insurance. He may sell, keep, or feed his crop as he wishes in the usual market manner. This plan does not in any way involve participation in marketing—it accomplishes its end by dealing solely in production, and that in the case of crops only to the extent of limiting acreage.

The Farm Board, it is suggested, should be required to allow a margin in estimating the domestic allotment of crops for the first year; for example, 10 per cent less than the conservative estimate of the amount required for domestic consumption. Thereafter the allotment of crops should be in each year the exact amount of the actual consumption in the preceding year.

It is asked how a new farmer could participate, or one who had not produced any of the product in question during the past five years. The answer is that the farm in the unit of allotment, regardless of ownership or tenantry, so a young farmer could come into the allotment going with the farm. In the other case, the farmer could begin producing the crop in question, and since the allotment each year would be based on actual production (or acreage) in the past five years, he would gradually come into his desired allotment. Similarly, any farmer decreasing his acreage would receive a correspondingly diminishing allotment. This would permit gradual shifts in production as from farm to farm and area to area.

County commissions, under the draft of the bill, would work without compensation but employ such clerical help or executive help as would be needed. Members of the State commission would be allowed per diem and expenses. Appeals from decisions of the county commissions would be made to the State commissions and from the State commissions to the Farm Board or an arbitration board. It is not believed there would be many such appeals, because under an annual reallotment there would be opportunity to correct any mistakes or inequalities.

The plan is necessarily changed somewhat in its application to hogs. A bushel of wheat is a bushel of wheat and a pound of cotton is a pound of cotton, but a pig may be marketed at 100 pounds or at 500 pounds. So in the case of hogs there must be control of the size of the hog as well as the number.

In the case of crops the acre is used as the unit of control. In the case of hogs it is proposed to use the sow in the same way. The survey in the case of hogs would reveal the average number of brood sows on the farm in question for the past five years. The Farm Board would thus have the total of brood sows, and it is suggested that the plan be not put into operation for hogs until the survey shows 95 per cent of the brood sows of the country by a check with Department of Agriculture figures and other records. The individual allotment would be in number of brood sows.

At the outset of the allotment year for hogs the Farm Board would estimate the annual domestic consumption of hog products; this, divided by the total number of brood sows, would give the domestic consumption ratio of pounds that may be marketed, under the allotment contract, by each farmer, and receive the bonus of 3 cents per pound. In addition, the Farm Board shall estimate the exports of hog products and divide this by the number of brood sows in the country, and this would give the ratio of pounds each farmer might sell in addition to the domestic-consumption ratio. The sum of the two would be the maximum number of pounds he would be permitted to market for slaughter. The Farm Board must be required to revise its estimate of both domestic consumption and exports each month, each time on an annual basis, for guidance to the farmer through the resulting ratio for each also announced at the same time.

Each farmer would be required to report on a form provided each sale of hogs, either for breeding, for feeding, or for slaughter. At the end of the year the county commission would total his sales for slaughter. If the total did not exceed the total indicated by the sales ratio as announced by the Farm Board, multiplied by the number of sows allotted to him, he would receive an allotment certificate of 3 cents per pound on the total number of pounds allowed him under the domestic consumption ratio. However, if his total sales for slaughter should exceed the gross sales allowed under the gross-sales ratio, then the excess shall be deducted from the number of pounds on which he receives a bonus.

For example: A farmer's allotment of brood sows is 10; the domestic consumption ratio for the year as announced by the Farm Board is 1,000 pounds per sow; and the export ratio is 100 pounds, the sales ratio, of course, being 1,100 pounds. If the farmer had sold for slaughter not more than 1,100 pounds, he would receive on his allotment certificate $300. If, however, he had sold 13,000 pounds in all, the excess of 2,000 pounds would be deducted from the 10,000 pounds on which otherwise his bonus would be figured; so that, instead of $300, he would receive $240.

In operation this would result in each farmer selling his drove when it about reached the gross allowed him. With small litters, it would mean heavy hogs; with large litters, light ones. In the case of hogs, certificates must be transferable, in whole or in part. Thus, if a farmer lost his hogs by cholera, he could sell his certificate; thus providing insurance for his hog crop. If his feed crop should fail, he could sell his pigs and also his certificate. Thus there would be entire freedom in the handling of droves.

A tax of 3 cents per pound on lard substitutes must be provided by the act if it applies to hogs.

This automatic balance between consumption and supply of hogs would in itself completely stabilize the market, do away with extremes in weights and violent fluctuations in markets. If sales were diverted to beef and mutton, the sales ratio would immediately come down, so that there would be no excess on the market. The packer would be protected, and if futures on exports are recognized, it should greatly assist the packer in handling product.

BENEFITS FROM THE PLAN

While extravagant claims are usually made for proposed legislation, the following anticipated benefits from the proposed act are, I believe, at least arguable:

First. It not only prevents any increase in production as a consequence of realization of the tariff on farm products not now enjoying it, but it provides for a positive method of decreasing or increasing production as it is evident to the Farm Board is required either for a fair income to the producer or a fair price to the consumer; and in addition, the tariff rates would be flexible, providing a further safeguard to consumers.

Second. Thus the act would accomplish real stabilization, in an unsuccessful attempt to secure which Congress has made available to the Farm Board a half billion dollars, and it would be accomplished by dealing altogether with production and not at all with marketing. At the same time the present marketing act is not disturbed, this being proposed as an addition. Thus the cooperatives could still be assisted or encouraged. But with stabilized markets their operations could easily be financed without Government funds, thus releasing in all probability much, if not all, of the five hundred millions voted to the Farm Board. This is a source of income for the Treasury which has been overlooked in the quest for a balance for the Budget. Very largely, therefore, it could be used to put the Government out of the grain and cotton businesses.

Third. The bill attains all the ends and more of present and proposed legislation, as heretofore explained.

Fourth. The measure would produce not less than $700,000,000 of tariff benefits to the producers of wheat, cotton, hogs, tobacco, and rice, and much more, probably, as a result of markets strengthened by stabilization and by bringing production closely into balance with consumption.

Fifth. It would make certain the collection of outstanding seed and feed loans made by the Federal Government and would probably render them unnecessary in the future, as the allotment certificates could be used for credit.

Sixth. The direct returns to producers would amortize the $7,000,000,000 of farm mortgages now outstanding (to use a most conservative figure) in 20 years. That is to say, the $700,000,000 would pay 5 per cent interest on the principal and retire the principal in 20 years, making no allowance for reductions in interest as the balance due is decreased. This would show the way to hundreds of thousands of farmers who are now unable, because of low prices, even to pay interest on their indebtedness, or even their property taxes.

Seventh. This, in turn, would protect the Federal land banks and private farm-loan companies from further losses, and should enable them to dispose of lands taken on foreclosure at satisfactory prices. In other words, and what is more significant, it would put a firm bottom under the farm real-estate market, with all the resulting benefits in bringing about a recovery in agriculture.

Eighth. Through the stabilization and prevention of overproduction made positively possible under this plan, the Farm Board should be able to recover losses sustained in its attempts to stabilize the wheat and cotton markets.

Ninth. It would decentralize administration of one important governmental activity. The county commission is the important body in this set-up, and thus the problems of the farmer would be largely dealt with by his neighbors.

Tenth. It would bring about the first price recovery, and this is now recognized by responsible business leaders as the one way by which to begin a return of public confidence.

Eleventh. It would open a market closed for the past 10 years because the exchange value of farm products has kept the farm dollar at a discount of from 8 to 48 cents, as shown by Department of Agriculture reports. The 30,000,000 people dependent on agriculture have not participated in the buying of the past decade for want of purchasing power. Potential sales to them are simply enormous.

Twelfth. In a word, this is an emergency reconstruction measure of the first magnitude, but markedly different from others enacted and proposed in that it would be completely self-financed, making it possible for our greatest industry to help itself to its feet.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting the nomination of Capt. Harry G. Hamlet, of Washington, to be commandant, with the rank of rear admiral, in the Coast Guard of the United States, for the term of four years, in place of Rear Admiral Frederick C. Billard, deceased, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 249, to strike out lines 4 to 24, as follows:

(3) Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, the refund provided by this subsection—(A) may be applied as a credit against the tax shown by subsequent returns of the manufacturer, producer, or importer, and (B) may be made to the dealer instead of to the manufacturer, producer, or importer, if the manufacturer, producer, or importer waives any claim for the amount so to be refunded.

(4) When the refund, credit, or abatement provided for in this subsection has been allowed to the manufacturer, producer, or importer, he shall remit to the dealer to whom was sold the article in respect of which the refund, credit, or abatement was allowed, so much of that amount of the tax corresponding to the refund, credit, or abatement as was included in or added to the price paid or agreed to be paid by the dealer. Upon the failure of the manufacturer, producer, or importer to make such remission he shall be liable to the dealer for damages in the amount of three times the amount thereof, and the court shall include in any judgment in favor of the dealer in any suit for the recovery of such damages, costs of the suit and a reasonable attorney's fee to be fixed by the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 250, to strike out:

SEC. 606. TAX ON BOATS

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Yachts and motor boats not designed for trade, fishing, or national defense; and pleasure boats and pleasure canoes if sold for more than $15.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, how much of a loss will the country sustain, or how much of a loss will the Treasury sustain, by virtue of this amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. It is estimated at about $500,000.

Mr. DILL. It seems to me this is one of the most indefensible amendments the committee has proposed. Here is a provision that proposes to put a tax upon yachts not used in trade or business. We have been talking to-night about the desperate condition of various kinds of business, and yet here is a tax that is proposed to be levied on pleasure yachts and boats. I would like to know on what theory the committee struck out this tax?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, many of the so-called yachts embraced under this amendment would be nothing more than a fishing boat. It is pretty hard to draw the line, because a man having a seasonal business, fishing two or three months, may then use his boat for pleasure, and it becomes a so-called pleasure yacht.

Mr. DILL. But the amendment says if it is used for fishing it is exempt. I want the Senator from Utah to answer my question, if he will. What was the theory of the committee upon which the amendment was struck out?

Mr. SMOOT. The only theory I know anything about was that we tried to strike out of the bill all the nuisance taxes.

Mr. DILL. But they did not strike out the automobile tax.

Mr. SMOOT. We had to have that provision to raise money. I am not going to object to whatever the Senate may want to do in the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, after trying in every conceivable way to adopt some just basis for taxing pleasure boats, whether by length or power, or in whatever way, the committee gave it up as a bad job and decided to eliminate it altogether. There were two or three standards proposed. We would march up the hill one day and then the next day we would march down the hill. No man could keep up with the committee on that and a lot of other things unless he wore roller skates.

Mr. DILL. This provision lays down a cost basis of $15. I have no prejudice against people who have yachts, but would like to have one myself. However, if I had money enough to buy a yacht for myself, I think I would have money enough to pay taxes on it.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amendment provides 10 per cent on a basis of $15. I may point out to the Senator that many men would prefer to live on the water and buy a $200 or $300 motor boat in place of an automobile, yet the committee would tax the automobile only 4 per cent and under this amendment would tax the yacht 10 per cent. Certainly the yacht owner is entitled, if he wants to go out on the water, at least not to pay any greater tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call attention to one reason why it went out, and that is because we provided in the committee, before the bill was reported, a tax on the use of the boat. When we did that, this provision was stricken out. Finally the provision relating to the use of the boat was stricken out, and then both of them were out.

Mr. DILL. Then the excuse on which it was stricken out was gone, and it became unwise to disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. It is up to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I know that in the discussion of this item there was some suggestion made that a considerable number of persons would find employment in building these small boats and that a large number of them were being built along the Atlantic coast, if not on the Pacific coast.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think a 10 per cent tax is going to interfere with employment sufficiently to justify striking out a tax that will bring in at least $500,000?

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, I realize that the Senator wants to get at the so-called pleasure or sporting yachts. May I point out to him that we have already increased the cost of operating these yachts by increasing the cost of the fuel upon which they run? I am only speaking locally for the moment, but three years ago in Maryland hard-shelled crabs brought $5 a barrel. To-day the same barrel full of hard-shelled crabs is selling for $1. Soft-shelled crabs can be bought for 20 cents a dozen. In dealing with these yachts it is very hard to draw a definition that will bring the boat out of the class of a work boat and put it in the class of a pleasure boat, because many of these boats are used only two or three months for the business of fishing and the rest of the year they are pleasure yachts.

Mr. DILL. The Senator's discussion does not apply because the amendment specifically says if used for these purposes. It seems to me ridiculous to tax automobiles and not make any distinction whether used for pleasure or otherwise, and then to relieve the yacht owners and pleasure-boat owners of any tax at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. The committee wants this provision stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the action of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee [putting the question]. The amendment is rejected. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 250, after line 19, to strike out:

SEC. 608. TAX ON MECHANICAL REFRIGERATORS

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold:

(a) Household type refrigerators (for single or multiple cabinet installations) operated with electricity, gas, kerosene, or other means (including parts or accessories therefor sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof).

(b) Cabinets, compressors, condensers, expansion units, absorbers, and controls (hereinafter referred to as "refrigerator components") for, or suitable for use as part of or with, any of the articles enumerated in subsection (a) (including in each case parts or accessories for such refrigerator components sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof) except when sold as component parts of complete refrigerators or refrigerating or cooling apparatus. Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, the tax under this subsection shall not apply in the case of sales of any such refrigerator components by the manufacturer, producer, or importer to a manufacturer or producer of refrigerators or refrigerating or cooling apparatus. If any such refrigerator components are resold by such vendee otherwise than on or in connection with, or with the sale of, complete refrigerators or refrigerating or cooling apparatus, manufactured or produced by such vendee, then for the purposes of this section the vendee shall be considered the manufacturer or producer of the refrigerator components so resold.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 252, to strike out:

SEC. 609. TAX ON SPORTING GOODS

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Tennis rackets, nets, racket covers and presses, skates, snowshoes, skis, toboggans, canoe paddles and cushions, polo mallets, baseball bats, gloves, masks, protectors, shoes and uniforms, football helmets, harness and goals, basketball goals and uniforms, golf bags and clubs, lacrosse sticks, balls of all kinds, including baseballs, footballs, tennis, golf, lacrosse, billiard and pool balls, fishing rods and reels, billiard and pool tables, chess and checker boards and pieces, dice, games and parts of games (except playing cards and children's toys and games); and all similar articles commonly or commercially known as sporting goods.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, on page 250 did the provision relating to mechanical refrigerators go out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. We should have a reconsideration of that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; that ought to be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered and the amendment passed over.

Mr. CONNALLY. The committee still has that under advisement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 252, after line 15, to strike out:

SEC. 610. TAX OF FIREARMS, SHELLS, AND CARTRIDGES

There is hereby imposed upon firearms, shells, and cartridges, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold. The tax imposed by this section shall not apply (1) to articles sold for the use of the United States, any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, or (2) to pistols and revolvers.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I request that the amendment just stated go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over, and the clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, at the top of page 253, to strike out:

SEC. 611. TAX ON CAMERAS

There is hereby imposed upon cameras, weighing not more than 100 pounds, and lenses for such cameras, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 253, after line 5, to strike out:

SEC. 612. TAX ON MATCHES

There is hereby imposed upon matches, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax of 4 cents per 1,000 matches.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Hull	Pittman
Bailey	Couzens	Johnson	Reed
Bankhead	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Barkley	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bingham	Fess	Keyes	Shortridge
Blaine	Fletcher	King	Smith
Borah	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	George	Lewis	Steiwer
Broussard	Glass	Logan	Stephens
Bulkley	Gore	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Hale	McNary	Townsend
Byrnes	Harrison	Metcalf	Trammell
Capper	Hastings	Moses	Tydings
Carey	Hatfield	Neely	Vandenberg
Cohen	Hawes	Norbeck	Walcott
Connally	Hayden	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Coolidge	Hebert	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Howell	Oddie	Wheeler

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 253, after line 9, the committee propose to strike out:

SEC. 613. TAX ON CANDY

There is hereby imposed upon candy, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 253, line 17, after the word "to," to strike out "5 per cent" and insert "3 per cent," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 604. TAX ON CHEWING GUM

There is hereby imposed upon chewing gum or substitutes therefor, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire at this time to enter a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the committee amendments on pages 250, 251, and 252, and down to and including line 14, on page 253, were agreed to, with the exception of corrective amendments such as changing section numbers, and so on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Some of the amendments on the pages indicated went over by unanimous consent. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin will be entered on such amendments as were not passed over. The question is on the committee amendment on page 253, line 17.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a limited investigation of this subject discloses that the proposed tax on chewing gum is higher than that which was imposed during the World War. It is contended by the small manufacturers of this commodity that the tax is confiscatory. I note that the Finance Committee struck from the bill a large amount of revenue estimated to be raised by taxes on cosmetics, jewelry, furs, candy, soft drinks, matches, firearms, shells, refrigerators, sporting goods, and boats. The aggregate amount of the revenue thus stricken from the bill is very great indeed.

The sole item in that classification left in the bill is that now under consideration. It is true that the committee amendment proposes a reduction below the House rate, but I believe that it would be wise and just to make the rate the same as that which was imposed during the World War, and I make that suggestion to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I think the suggestion is enforced by the consideration that such articles as furs and jewelry have by the committee been eliminated from the bill. I do not understand the process by which the committee reached the conclusion that this particular commodity should carry a tax higher than that which was imposed during the World War.

Mr. SMOOT. In 1918 the rate was 3 per cent, and the committee went back to the rate of 1918 and struck out 5 per cent provided by the other House, as we had not adopted any rate higher than that of the 1918 law as to any of the other items.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My information is that this rate is higher than the rate that was imposed during the war.

Mr. SMOOT. The history of the matter is this: In 1917 when we first imposed the tax the rate was 2 per cent; then, in 1918, when, as the Senator will remember, we amended the act of 1917, we put a tax of 3 per cent on chewing gum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. In view of the eliminations that have been made, to which I have referred, I am going to suggest to the chairman of the committee that we impose the war rate of 2 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment to the committee amendment, and will let it go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, would it be in order to move to strike out section 604?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion would be in order after the committee amendment shall have been agreed to or perfected. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I move to strike out section 604.

Mr. HARRISON. That has already been stricken out.

Mr. BYRNES. No; section 604 is the section in reference to chewing gum.

Mr. HARRISON. In the copy of the bill which I have that section stricken out is marked section 614. There must be two very different copies of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 604 is the section relative to chewing gum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that by the amendment which I proposed a moment ago to the committee amendment the proposed tax was reduced to 2 per cent, the committee amendment being 3 per cent. Now, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] proposes to strike out the provision. I do not concur in that motion. I think that before the bill shall have been disposed of the Senate, in all probability, will find it necessary to restore the tax on such items as cosmetics, jewelry, furs, sporting goods, and so forth.

I have had some discussion upon this subject with some of the members of the Finance Committee, and it is my information that the committee was of the opinion that many of these items were in the nature of luxuries. I should like to have some explanation given for striking out a tax that would be easily borne. Take a tax on furs, for instance—how can there be justification for striking that out and then imposing heavier taxes on certain other commodities that are in no sense luxuries?

Mr. SMOOT. I can explain to the Senator why the action was taken in the case of furs. The committee tried to find some plan by which the tax could be collected on furs, but the only manner in which it could be done was to impose the tax in such a way that it would apply to every coat and every garment on which there was a piece of fur. That seemed absolutely impossible. The tax went out because of the difficulty of administration, and for no other reason.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not quite agree with the Senator from Utah that this tax and others of a like nature mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas went out because the committee found they were unworkable.

Mr. SMOOT. I was only referring to furs.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The fact of the matter is, may I say to the Senator from Arkansas, that the committee worked for a good many days getting these taxes perfected, as we thought. They were all in the bill on Thursday night, but on Friday morning the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and proposed what he called a "compromise suggestion," which eliminated the taxes of luxuries of the nature the Senator has mentioned and provided for the tax on automobiles to the extent of the increase recommended by the committee, the tax on bank checks without a $5 exemption, and several other items.

The committee voted that morning to throw out all its work of a week or 10 days and accept the proposal made by the Secretary of the Treasury. May I say to the Senator that that was all done in about 30 minutes' time? There was not even a printed copy of his suggestions there; all he had was a small typewritten sheet that he read to us, and some of us read it after the action was taken.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A memorandum furnished me by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] shows that under the rate imposed by the House bill the estimate of the revenue to be derived from a tax on furs was $20,000,000 and the estimated revenue to be derived from a tax on jewelry was $15,000,000. I should like the Senator from Utah to state to the Senate why the tax on jewelry was eliminated and why a tax on chewing gum was left in to bear the entire burden of the special tax imposed on so-called luxuries?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] were present, because he called the attention of the committee to the fact that cheap jewelry, which constitutes the great bulk of jewelry in the United States, could not bear a tax of this kind. There was another Senator who took the same position—I have forgotten who it was.

Mr. COUZENS. It was the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would not be difficult to exempt cheap jewelry, but to exempt jewelry on the theory that it would be oppressive to tax it is to me absolutely incomprehensible, I do not care who attempts to justify it. Jewelry is ornamental; it never could be classified as anything other than a luxury in a civilized country; and yet the committee exempts it on the theory that it would be oppressive to the poor to tax jewelry. I think somebody who stands for this proposition will have to "come again," in classical language, and give a further explanation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the jewelry tax gives a very fine example of just what I mean by saying that the work of the committee was done and then undone within a few minutes. We worked a long time on the jewelry tax and there was a great deal of discussion in the committee about it. Finally we exempted cheap jewelry, such as is sold in 10-cent stores, and after persistent effort on the part of the Senator from Utah, over my protest, an exemption was made of solid silverware. Even so, however, after all that, the tax remaining would still have provided $12,000,000 of revenue. So, as a matter of fact, we had only lost $3,000,000, because, as the bill came from the House, it was estimated that the revenue to be derived from the tax would be $15,000,000 and not $20,000,000, as the Senator was informed. So by the action of the committee there was only a loss of $3,000,000. However, when the Secretary appeared on Friday morning in 30 minutes we threw the two days' work we had put in on the jewelry tax out of the window and threw the revenue out with it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Wisconsin whether the same statement applies substantially to cosmetics?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The tax on cosmetics went out along with taxes on other items, the elimination of which was recommended by the Secretary.

Cosmetics afford another example of the same situation. We had spent a long time in considering the tax on toilet preparations and cosmetics. May I say to the Senator that I spent many weary hours in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs listening to arguments pro and con regarding the tax on cosmetics? We finally cut out toothpaste and mouth washes and common ordinary soap.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That was very sound policy.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It took two or three days to do it, and after we had fussed around with it we had lost $8,000,000, but still had $12,000,000 which would be derived from the tax on the finer cosmetics. Then the Secretary appeared, and in 15 minutes we throw all that work and all that revenue out of the window.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not understand the statement as to the amount of revenue that would have been derived from the tax on cosmetics after the eliminations referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin had been made by the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Twelve million dollars would have been derived from the tax which was left.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The estimate under the House bill was $25,000,000, according to the memorandum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; that is not correct, may I say to the Senator. It was $20,000,000. So we lost $8,000,000 as a result of all of our work in trying to make this a fair tax, and trying to direct it, may I say to the Senator, if I correctly interpret the intent of the committee, toward what might be termed luxuries as toilet preparations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I realize that both the Senator from Wisconsin and I are treading on very dangerous ground when we undertake to characterize a cosmetic as a luxury. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But I think that was the intent of the committee; and that is why we took out the ordinary soaps and the tooth pastes and the mouth washes. That is, we did not want to put a tax on cleanliness or prophylaxis of the oral cavity, but we did propose to put a tax on what have always been considered luxuries so far as cosmetics are concerned. For some strange reason, however, in 30 minutes, under the lashing of the Secretary of the Treasury, this committee that had worked for two days on this tax, trying to get it in justifiable form, threw it out of the window, and decided to bear down heavily on two or three items that are in this so-called compromise bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it would occasion some annoyance and some inconvenience to the consumers or users of cosmetics, excepting the articles to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred as having been eliminated by the committee; but when it is considered that we are taxing almost everything, and imposing burdens on various forms of industry, it does seem to me that a tax of this character—a tax on jewelry and on cosmetics—is to be justified by every sound consideration, in spite of the fact that it may occasion some annoyance to the consumers of those commodities.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say to my friend from Arkansas that I can think of no greater disappointment than will result from the effort to collect $15,000,000 on jewelry. If there is any one thing that has been demolished and destroyed by the present economic conditions, it is the jewelry business; and it is perfectly apparent why—because jewelry is such a luxury that people simply are not buying.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is true of many of the taxes imposed in this bill. We are levying taxes under this bill on useful and necessary commodities, and the sales of those commodities in many instances have been reduced to a minimum. I still can not understand why it is not fair to impose some rate of tax on a commodity which is not useful, which is not necessary, which is purely ornamental.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in moving to strike out this section I am actuated by the same views expressed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Looking at the page upon which the section appears, I find that the committee has stricken from the bill the tax upon polo mallets, upon golf bags, upon footballs, golf, lacrosse, fishing rods and reels, the tax upon grape concentrates, the tax upon cameras, the tax on candy, the tax on soft drinks, the tax upon everything except chewing gum, knowing that when it is levied the manufacturer may pinch a small piece of chewing gum from the package that the children of America buy.

The man who plays golf is safe. The man who plays polo will have no tax upon the polo mallets. The fisherman will have no tax upon his fishing rod and reel. Jewelry and furs are eliminated; and after due consideration a tax is levied upon chewing gum, that the children of America may receive a smaller piece of gum for the money they pay!

It seems to me that the revenue that is levied is inconsequential in considering the injustice of discriminating in that way against one item.

The statement that the Senator from Arkansas had shows that the revenue from cosmetics is $25,000,000. We strike that out. From jewelry the revenue is $15,000,000.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think the Senator wants to be correct; and if he will look at the report of the committee he will find that the estimates the Senator is reading from are wrong.

Mr. BYRNES. The estimates handed to me, as I understand, are the estimates of the House. Whether or not they are correct I do not know.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; that is the information I have. I have not had an opportunity of verifying them.

Mr. COUZENS. This is the report on the House bill.

Mr. BYRNES. All right; give me that.

Toilet preparations, $15,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have the impression, which is quite general, that the production of chewing gum is in the hands of a monopoly in this country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no!

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us have the information on that subject. How widely are the manufacturers of chewing gum distributed? I understood that the Wrigley people practically had a monopoly of the production of that material.

Mr. BYRNES. I must say that I have no information as to whether or not they have a monopoly in the manufacture of chewing gum; but I do know that inevitably the result of levying this tax is that the purchaser is to have taken from the package of gum just so much gum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. While I do not think the larger manufacturers of chewing gum have the slightest objection to the proposed tax, there are a number of small manufacturers who will be put out of business if the original tax in the bill is to be imposed, but they can survive under the tax the Senate committee has agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator advise us what per cent of the total amount is produced by these small manufacturers?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I can not give that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, my information is that about 60 per cent is controlled by one concern.

Mr. SMOOT. The revenue is $2,000,000, and I will say to the Senate that I received a telegram to-day from Mr. Wrigley opposing the tax on chewing gum.

Mr. BYRNES. I have no information as to the correspondence between Mr. Wrigley and the Senator from Utah, but will the Senator tell us——

Mr. SMOOT. The telegram came to-day, Mr. President.

Mr. BYRNES. I did not ask about the telegram. I am not particularly interested in it. What I want to know from the Senator from Utah is why he would strike out of this bill $15,000,000 of revenue from toilet preparations, $15,000,000 of revenue from furs, $12,000,000 of revenue from candy, millions of dollars from jewelry, $500,000 from yachts and motor boats, $6,500,000 from sporting goods and cameras, and then take chewing gum as the only item to be left in the bill, having a revenue, according to this report, of $3,000,000, and I understand the Senator says $2,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. After the committee agreed to the plan submitted by the Treasury Department, there was a certain amount of money over and above that which it was originally estimated that we should raise. After that consideration the recommendation of the Treasury Department was agreed to. Then the amount of money that would be raised by the bill was found to be more than that which we anticipated raising when the bill was first written. Therefore the committee returned to the bill and took out these items that are stricken out, on account of its being unnecessary to put them in the bill in order to raise the requisite amount of money.

Mr. BYRNES. I understand the Senator from Utah to say that after the committee learned that the revenue bill as finally agreed to, after the conference with the Secretary of the Treasury, would raise more money than was anticipated, they went back to the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. With these items in.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; with these items in—they went back to strike them out, and they struck out yachts and furs and jewelry and candy and golf balls and polo mallets and left the tax upon chewing gum.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. BYRNES. Then, Mr. President, I urge my motion to strike out the tax upon chewing gum, section 604.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely want the RECORD to be as I understand, Mr. President.

I think the statement of the Senator from Utah leaves the impression that we did not realize that we were eliminating all these taxes when we adopted the compromise proposal of the Secretary. One of the arguments made by those who supported that motion was that that would get rid of all of these so-called luxury taxes. That, I may say, was one of the reasons why I could not vote to support the so-called compromise proposal.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield again to the Senator from Wisconsin to tell us whether the tax upon grape concentrates was eliminated from the bill, too.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I understand that that is still in the bill. As to the other taxes to which we have been referring in the colloquy here recently, it was understood by every member of the committee present when he voted for the Secretary's proposal on a typewritten slip, and swallowed it en bloc with one gulp, that these taxes were all going out, including, of course, the amendment containing the 1922 income-tax rates.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, some of us here are literally astonished at the statement that we are going to derive more revenue from this bill than we have any use for. My information is that even after we complete this tax bill—if we ever do—we shall have to go to work and drastically reduce the expenditures of government in order to balance the Budget.

If that is true, why strike out the taxes on furs and jewelry and pleasure boats and things of that sort? It seems to me we had better restore those than to strike out the tax on chewing gum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is the estimate that was before the committee at the time. We had an estimate as the bill was written, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, and we had provided in the bill the amount of tax necessary to meet that deficit as furnished the committee by the Treasury Department. When the new plan came up and the additional taxes were recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, we adopted those; after doing that we took off the taxes that we thought not necessary here to meet the expenses of the Government and balance the Budget. That is why they went out.

Mr. GLASS. I understand that detail; but I am astonished to learn that the deficit has been met by this tax bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I have already said, Mr. President, that, in my opinion, even with all the taxes imposed in the bill, we shall still have a deficit. How much it will be, I can not say; but, based upon the estimates made by the Treasury Department and based upon the revenue that will be derived, this will balance the Budget as far as the amount that was to be raised by the bill is concerned.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Utah may believe that; no doubt he does believe it, but I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fearful myself, Mr. President, that we shall not have any too much revenue.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, we ought not to go to the country allowing them to believe that we have balanced the Budget and then come back here next winter and find that we have not come within a thousand miles of balancing the Budget.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wish to say that the Senator from Virginia is absolutely correct. All the bills that were under consideration—the bill as it passed the House when we first got it, what I claim was the Senate committee bill after we had finished two weeks of work on it, and Mr. Mills's bill, which was produced in about 30 minutes before the committee—allow for two hundred to two hundred and fifty million dollars of economies in arriving at the statement that they will get the Budget balanced on paper.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the sporting man is a good fellow. He who engages in that wonderful amusement or diversion, about which everybody boasts and in which so few are efficient, the golfer, would not object to paying a tax. The sporting man would not object to paying a tax under present conditions.

I think it is the strangest policy I ever contemplated to eliminate $4,500,000 of revenue from a source like that embraced in section 609 of the House text, providing for a tax on sporting goods, and then resort to some of the levies which are carried in this bill.

If the committee amendment striking out that tax has been agreed to, the vote ought to be reconsidered, and the provision should be kept in the bill.

There would not be a man in the United States who was a true sportsman who would think that he and his game—his boat, his polo mallet, his tennis racket—ought to be exempted from taxes, while other taxes which are in this bill which embarrass industry and impose burdens on poor people are retained.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there can be no doubt but that we are going to have to recur to these propositions, and some of us, foreseeing that, have entered motions to reconsider the votes by which the various items were agreed to. Already we have lost $16,000,000 from the bill as the result of the vote on the two amendments that were adopted relative to trucks and automobiles.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that on section 609, providing for a tax on sporting goods, pool tables, billiard tables, and so forth, there was no discussion, and the amendment was agreed to when nobody was paying any attention to it. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he ask unanimous consent now that the vote by which that amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the reason why we do not do that now is the reason stated by the Senator from Wisconsin. We have gone over these various items and there are certain minor changes made in them.

If we are to adopt these amendments—and I think without question we must do so—we ought to adopt the language agreed on as an outcome of consideration by the Finance Committee of the House provisions. There are mostly minor changes, but some of them might be quite material. I think we might as well adopt the provision that was agreed on by the Finance Committee dealing with sporting goods, for instance.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to do that the Senator would have to have the vote reconsidered by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. That is right; and we have already entered a motion to reconsider the vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I was wondering why we could not consider it by unanimous consent right now.

Mr. HARRISON. Some of us have thought that we should find out just what is needed. For instance, we shall soon come to the item of admissions. We all realize there has been great propaganda about that. There is a great group of lobbyists about admissions, and we shall have perhaps to raise the tax to 25 per cent. It will cause a loss of thirty-five or forty million dollars even at that, and that will wipe out nearly all of the revenue that would be raised under these provisions, because of provisions stricken out of the House text aggregating $105,000,000. As amended by the Senate those same provisions would total only seventy and one-half million dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, what the Senate has before it now is only the House provision.

Mr. HARRISON. It is the House provision.

Mr. NORRIS. And the committee made certain changes in that which do not appear here in the bill. In order to agree to those, we would have first to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any trouble about that.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say that, so far as I am concerned, I hope we can recur to each one of these items.

Mr. NORRIS. We must recur to them.

Mr. HARRISON. And adopt the amendments which the Senate committee, after consideration, recommended.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I would like to get. That is not before us now. We do not know just what it is.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I want to ask whether the Senator would have any objection to placing section 604 on the same basis with the other sections referred to?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think anybody would have any objection.

Mr. BYRNES. If the committee, after consideration by the Senate, shall deem it necessary to reconsider and restore the tax upon polo mallets, fishing rods, and things of that kind, very well; but to leave this one section out of all these excise taxes, I submit, is unfair.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is fair to leave it on the same basis.

Mr. BYRNES. I insist on my motion to strike out that section, so that they will all be on the same basis.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not insist on his motion to strike out. Then we would have that out, and if we afterwards put the others in we would be doing an injustice the other way. I do not want to vote on the Senator's motion to strike out until we settle the other question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment to section 609 was agreed to be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. Why does not the Senator include also section 610?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am going to make a separate request as to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I make a similar request with respect to the committee amendment to section 610.

Mr. SMOOT. That went over, anyhow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That went over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to settle this whole matter of these special items that were stricken out by the committee, I do not believe there would be any objection on the part of any member of the committee, if anybody asks at any time for a reconsideration of the vote, that that should be agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am going to ask that the vote by which the committee amendment to sections 602, 603, and 604, respectively, of the House text be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does not the Senator include section 606, at the top of page 250?

Mr. DILL. That was rejected, and the language remains in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Section 602 provides for the tax on toilet preparations, section 603 for the tax on furs, section 604 for the tax on jewelry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that section 602 in my bill covers the tax on automobiles.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I refer to the sections in the House text stricken out by the committee. My request is that the vote by which the committee amendment to the section imposing a tax on toilet preparations, to the further section imposing a tax on furs, and the section imposing a tax on jewelry be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. METCALF. I object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas that I think he will find that we have entered motions to reconsider the votes whereby all of these committee amendments striking out House language were agreed to. I think either the Senator from Mississippi or myself has entered such motions. So that we are in a position to move for reconsideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not understand that consent was given.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No consent was given to enter the motions. One does not have to have consent for that.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly the Senator does not; but I understood him to say there had been consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the vote by which the committee amendment relating to toilet preparations was agreed to be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I make the same motion with respect to the vote by which the committee amendment relating to the tax on furs was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I also make the same motion with respect to the vote by which the committee amendment relating to the tax on jewelry was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. After that is acted upon, then the motion of the Senator from South Carolina will be submitted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is with reference to chewing gum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is with reference to chewing gum.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the question the Chair has just submitted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on page 253, line 14, relating to chewing gum, as amended by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to strike out section 604, as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from South Carolina merely wanted the provision with reference to chewing gum put in the same position as that occupied by jewelry and these other articles.

Mr. BYRNES. What I stated to the Senator from Mississippi was that if the items relating to the taxes on jewelry, furs, and sporting goods were passed over for the time being I was entirely willing to have that done.

My motion now is to strike this section out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator from South Carolina that if that motion is carried, this item with reference to chewing gum will be stricken out, and it will then be in the same category with the other items. We will then have to move to reconsider, if we are to get any revenue upon all of these propositions. Would not the Senator permit this to go over, just as these other propositions are going over, because some committee amendments are to be offered as substitutes for these various paragraphs?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the understanding of the Senator from Mississippi is that this section is on the same footing with the other sections referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, and there is no dissent from that understanding, I will have no objection to its going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion will be passed over.

The clerk will report the next amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, what is the status of the committee amendment, beginning at the top of page 252, relating to the tax on sporting goods?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote by which that amendment was agreed to has been reconsidered, and the matter has gone over.

Mr. BRATTON. Did that amendment go over and does it now occupy the same status as the three amendments to which the Senator from Arkansas addressed himself?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is one amendment that is included in his request. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 253, after line 18, to strike out:

SECTION 615. TAX ON SOFT DRINKS

(a) There is hereby imposed—

(1) Upon all beverages derived wholly or in part from cereals or substitutes therefor, containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax of 2 cents per gallon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 254, to strike out lines 1 to 24, inclusive, as follows:

(2) Upon all unfermented fruit juices, in natural or slightly concentrated form, or such fruit juices to which sugar has been added (as distinguished from finished or fountain sirups), intended for consumption as beverages with the addition of water or water and sugar, and upon all imitations of any such fruit juices, and upon all carbonated beverages, commonly known as soft drinks (except those described in paragraph (1)), manufactured, compounded, or mixed by the use of concentrate, essence, or extract, instead of a finished or fountain sirup, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax of 2 cents per gallon.

(3) Upon all still drinks, containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, intended for consumption as beverages in the form in which sold (except natural or artificial mineral and table waters and imitations thereof, and pure apple cider), sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax of 2 cents per gallon.

(4) Upon all natural or artificial mineral waters or table waters, whether carbonated or not, and all imitations thereof, sold by the producer, bottler, or importer thereof, in bottles or other closed containers, at over 12½ cents per gallon, a tax of 2 cents per gallon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That relates to soft drinks and will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 255, to strike out lines 1 to 24, inclusive, as follows:

(5) Upon all finished or fountain sirups of the kinds used in manufacturing, compounding, or mixing drinks commonly known as soft drinks, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax of 9 cents per gallon; except that in the case of any such sirups intended to be used in the manufacture of carbonated beverages sold in bottles or other closed containers the rate shall be 5 cents per gallon. Where any person conducting a soda fountain, ice-cream parlor, or other similar place of business manufactures any sirups of the kinds described in this paragraph, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid on each gallon manufactured and used in the preparation of soft drinks a tax of 9 cents per gallon; and where any person manufacturing carbonated beverages manufactures and uses any such sirups in the manufacture of carbonated beverages sold in bottles or other closed containers there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid on each gallon of such sirups a tax of 5 cents per gallon. The taxes imposed by this paragraph shall not apply to finished or fountain sirups sold for use in the manufacture of a beverage subject to tax under paragraph (1) or (3), nor to any article enumerated in section 601 (c) (3).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, why does not that go over with the other amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is requested, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 256, to strike out lines 1 to 24, inclusive, and lines 1 to 11, on page 257, as follows:

(6) Upon all carbonic-acid gas sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, or by a dealer in such gas, to a manufacturer of any carbonated beverages, or to any person conducting a soda fountain, ice-cream parlor, or other similar place of business, and upon all carbonic-acid gas used by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof in the preparation of soft drinks, a tax of 4 cents per pound.

(b) Each manufacturer, producer, or importer of any of the articles enumerated in subsection (a) and each person who sells carbonic-acid gas to a manufacturer of carbonated beverages or to a person conducting a soda fountain, ice-cream parlor, or other similar place of business, shall make monthly returns under oath in duplicate and pay the tax imposed in respect of the articles enumerated in subsection (a) to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made at such times and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe. The tax shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time so fixed for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month from the time the tax became due until paid.

(c) Each person required to pay any tax imposed by subsection (a) shall procure and keep posted a certificate of registry in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary. Any person who fails to register or keep posted any certificate of registry in accordance with such regulations shall be subject to a penalty of not more than $1,000 for each such offense.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if these other matters are going over this should go over, too.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, why do we not pass these various items over to-night if the chairman of the Finance Committee is going to call the committee together at 6.50 in the morning or some other early hour, so we can recommend these various substitutes? I am sure the Finance Committee has no objection if we can balance the Budget through this plan. We adopted this amendment in the first place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to passing over the amendments? The Chair hears none, and the amendments will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 257, after line 14, to strike out:

SEC. 617. RETAIL SALES

If any manufacturer, producer, or importer liable under this title for tax based on the price for which any articles are sold by him customarily sells such articles both at wholesale and at retail, the tax in the case of any article sold by him at retail shall be computed on the price for which like articles are sold by him at wholesale.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If these other amendments are going over, should not this amendment go over, too?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to passing it over? The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment goes over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee that the next amendment go over, because it pertains to the soft-drinks paragraph; and if the other one went over, this should go over as well. I refer to section 612, on page 262. That which is stricken out pertains to soft drinks.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it should go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I notice on page 262, in the print I presume being used by the clerk, there are certain amendments recommended in section 611. Those were not acted on or considered, were they?

Mr. SMOOT. We have not reached that yet.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is section 611, which has to do with contracts of sales made prior to May 1.

Mr. SMOOT. That has gone over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is what I was especially interested in considering.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, who was it asked that the amendment relating to contracts made prior to May 1 should go over? Did I understand the Senator from Florida to ask that section 611 go over?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was suggesting it should be allowed to go over, unless it is desired to discuss it now. I think the object the committee seeks to accomplish is all right, probably.

Mr. SMOOT. We might as well discuss it now, if the Senator desires to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 262, line 3, after "Sec.," to strike out "619" and insert "611"; in the same line, after the word "to," to strike out "March" and insert "May"; in line 4, after the word "to," to strike out "March" and insert "May"; and in line 11, after the word "then," to insert "(unless the contract prohibits such addition)," so as to read:

SEC. 611. CONTRACTS PRIOR TO MAY 1, 1932

(a) If (1) any person has, prior to May 1, 1932, made a bona fide contract with another person for the sale, after the tax takes effect, of any article in respect of the sale of which a tax is imposed under this title, or in respect of which a tax is imposed under this subsection, and (2) such contract does not permit the adding to the amount to be paid under such contract, of the whole of such tax, then (unless the contract prohibits such addition) the vendee shall, in lieu of the vendor, pay so much of the tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the amendment in its present form would operate very unjustly against a great many people. The provision provides that any person who, prior to May 1, 1932, has made a contract with some one for sale shall be subjected to this tax. In the first place, it is retroactive. It is applying a tax to a person on a transaction which took place prior to the enactment of the law. There may be a good many contracts under the installment system which prevails in this country for the purchase of property, some of which have been made one or two or three years ago. Under those circumstances this would impose a tax upon the purchaser, the vendee, unless the vendor was subject to it, regardless of the fact that it was made prior to the enactment of the law or the imposition of the tax.

I presume the purpose of this provision was to try to anticipate and to check or bar any operations or accumulations on the part of any traders in anticipation of the tax. It may be all right to seek to accomplish that purpose, but the peculiar language and phraseology provided in this section would affect every honest transaction that has been made at any time previous for the consummation of a sale at a future date. It reads:

All sales contracts made prior to May 1, 1932.

If the vendor does not pay the tax, and May 1 is already past—then the vendee has to pay the tax at the time of the consummation of the sale. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. It is partially correct. I would like to know what amendment or modification the Senator would like to suggest, and then I can see just what the Senator is driving at.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, I have not given any study to this. It came to my mind probably 10 or 15 minutes ago as I was reading the bill. It occurred to me at that moment that it was subject to the comment which I have made. I desire to have it clarified so as to have it inflict no injustice upon entirely innocent people.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think there is something in the contention made by the able Senator from Florida. The bill is retroactive and would affect contracts that have been entered into anterior to the passage of the bill. If we can, before final action, strike out "May 1, 1932," and insert in lieu thereof the words "after the passage of this act," I think it would meet the objection of the Senator from Florida. I suggest that we pass the amendment over and let the committee consider it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That will be agreeable to me. All I wish is to have it clarified.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants it to go over, that is very well; but it seems to me it is perfectly plain what we desire to do. I think the wording as reported covers exactly the object the Senator now states he desires to reach. I do not think the Senator has any different idea with reference to the object of the amendment than the committee have. Of course, it can go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, we are in such a situation at the present time, with the reconsiderations that have been had, with the desire undoubtedly on the part of some of the members of the Finance Committee to meet early in the morning and consider those items that have been eliminated from the bill heretofore, but to-night practically have been restored, that I want to suggest to the Senator from Utah that we will make progress by taking a recess now until to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. There is very little left in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; we are coming now to the admission tax and the telegraph tax, and they will be somewhat dependent upon what the Finance Committee does with jewelry, sporting goods, and the like in its determination to be reached, as I understood the Senator, to-morrow morning probably.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to give notice to members of the Finance Committee now, because I can not get notice to them by mail, that the committee will meet to-morrow morning at not later than 8.30 o'clock. We have plenty to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why not have a session of the committee as soon as we recess to-night?

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. BARKLEY. I make that suggestion seriously.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to have a meeting as soon as we recess to-night. The Senate is to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock; and if the committee are to do anything at all with these items, that will give us only an hour and a half in the morning if the committee meets at half past 8.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think we might as well take a recess to-night if we have to get up early in the morning to work on this measure. I believe the Committee on Finance ought to meet in the morning and work out these various items in the hope that it will expedite matters.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Senator willing to have the committee meet at 8.30?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator consider this suggestion, in view of the vast amount of work the committee will have to do? The Senate ought not to meet at 10 o'clock in the morning, but at 11 o'clock, so as to give us an hour and a half or two hours to-morrow morning for the consideration of these matters in the committee. I suggest to my colleague that he ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into by which the Senate agreed to meet at 10 o'clock be modified or changed so that the Senate will not meet to-morrow until 11 o'clock, and thus give the committee ample time for consideration of these various matters.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see why we can not get up early and get to work at 8.30. I see no reason why we can not do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I made a suggestion to the Senator from Utah, which I think fell upon sympathetic ears, that he make a motion to take a recess.

Mr. SMOOT. I move the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. One moment, Mr. President. May I ask the Senator from Utah what time the Finance Committee will meet to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. At 8.30 a. m.

Mr. HARRISON. Eight thirty a. m. is almost out of the question. Why not make it 9 o'clock? The Senator has not gotten up at 8.30 in a good while. I suggest the Senator make it 9 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. If I did not have a part of my work done by 8.30 o'clock in the morning, I would never get through.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being under the order previously entered, until to-morrow, Thursday, May 26, 1932, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate May 25 (legislative day of May 9), 1932

COAST GUARD

Capt. Harry G. Hamlet, of Washington, to be Commandant, with the rank of rear admiral, in the Coast Guard of the United States, for a term of four years, in place of Rear Admiral Frederick C. Billard, deceased.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy holy spirit, that we may perfectly love Thee and worthily magnify Thy holy name. May the words of our lips and the meditations of our hearts be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the order agreed to on yesterday, the Chair declares the House to be in recess.

Accordingly the House stood in recess, to meet at the call of the Speaker.

MEMORIAL SERVICES

The Speaker of the House of Representatives presided.

The string quartette of the United States Navy Band Orchestra rendered "Andante Cantabile," by Tschaikowsky.

The Chaplain, Doctor Montgomery:

Almighty God, separated from the toils of the day, may this hour be a dedication. Make Thy Holy Spirit a minister and a messenger of love and faith. Our hearts are one; they express the sorrow of our fellow countrymen. Do Thou remember those, Blessed Lord, who are in the valley of affliction. In its hush and silence may they catch the floating notes wafted from the highlands of the upper world. O be the melody for the dirge, the sweetness for the cup, and the strength for the weary. In our losses, hear us O most merciful Father. With us the joys and the fellowships of time have been swept away. The dreams of the past struggle for expression; but as they are inspired from the passing scenes of life, they can never be fulfilled. O God, we would share again the changeless love of the unforgotten days. In the ages to come, beyond the menace and the mystery of mortality, we shall meet again—unafraid, conscious that our souls are becoming vaster and holier in the presence of the infinite God of man. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Three fishers went sailing out into the west,
Out into the west as the sun went down;
Each thought of the woman who loved him the best;
And the children stood watching them out of the town;
For men must work and women must weep,
There's little to earn and many to keep,
Though the harbor bar be moaning.

Three wives sat up in the lighthouse tower,
And they trimmed their lamps as the sun went down;
They looked at the squall and they looked at the shower,
And the rack it came rolling up ragged and brown!
But men must work and women must weep,
Though storms be sudden and waters deep,
And the harbor bar be moaning.

Three corpses lay on the shining sands
In the morning gleam as the tide went down,
And the women are weeping and wringing their hands
For those who never came back to the town;
For men must work and women must weep,
And the sooner it's over, the sooner to sleep,
And good-bye to the bar and its moaning.

As I stand by the cross on the lone mountain's crest
Looking toward the ultimate sea,
In the gloom of the mountain, a ship lies at rest,
And one sails away from the lea.
One spreads its white sails on a far-reaching track,
With pennant and sheet flowing free.
One hides in the shadows with sails laid aback,
The ship that is waiting for me.
But, lo, in the distance the clouds break away;
The Gate's glowing portals I see;
And I hear from the outgoing ship in the bay
The song of the sailors in glee.
So I think of the luminous footsteps
That bore them o'er dark Galilee,
And I wait for the signal to go to the shore,
To the ship that is waiting for me.

Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me; bless His holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits: Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies; who satisfieth thy mouth with good things so that thy youth is renewed like the eagles'. The Lord executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed. He made known His ways unto Moses, His acts unto the children of Israel. The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger and plenteous in mercy. He will not always chide; neither will He keep His anger forever. He hath not dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. As the heaven is high above the earth, so great is His mercy toward them that fear Him. As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. For He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust. As for man his days are as grass; as a flower of the field so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more. But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him and His righteousness unto children's children. Bless the Lord, O my soul.

Let not your heart be troubled; believe in God; believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also.

ALBERT HENRY VESTAL, REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE EIGHTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF INDIANA

School-teacher; prosecuting attorney of the fiftieth judicial circuit, 1900–1904; elected to Sixty-fifth and each succeeding Congress. Died April 1, 1932.

EDWARD M'MATH BEERS, REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE EIGHTEENTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA

Bank director; delegate to the Republican State convention in 1898; mayor of Mount Union, Pa., 1910–1914; associate judge of Huntingdon County, 1914–1923; elected to Sixty-eighth and each succeeding Congress. Died April 21, 1932.

Mrs. WINGO, a Representative from the State of Arkansas, standing in front of the Speaker's rostrum, placed a memorial rose in a vase as the name of each deceased Member was read by the Clerk.

Then followed one minute of devotional silence.

Mr. Ross Farrar sang "There Is No Death."

Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT, a Representative from the State of Montana, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. SCOTT LEAVITT, OF MONTANA

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, since that day, little more than a year ago, when on another occasion we met to pay affectionate tribute to colleagues of ours who had answered the roll call of eternity, 19 others have arisen from their labors among us and have gone out, never to return.

Just a moment ago we listened to the calling of their names. Silence, and after each the placing of a flower. Our ears yearned, loath to abandon hope, but no familiar voice responded. And yet was there, indeed, no answer? Was not that silence like the quiet of a starry night, when all the winds are hushed? Was not that silence like the stillness we have known alone in the vastness of the mountains or far out upon the soundless, breathing sea, when the all-pervading solitude has formed within our souls those revealing words, "Be still and know that I am God"?

It is in such silence that we find our faith arising like the sword of Arthur, out of the morass of our doubt and ready to our hand.

It is in such silence that we comprehend the revelation of our faith to be truly "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

It is in such stillness that our trust is able to speak to us with a clear voice, and say surely, if a man die, yet shall he live again.

This memorial service, held in accordance with a reverent custom, falls in the midst of the bicentennial year especially set apart and dedicated in the hearts of the American people to the thought of George Washington. It is fitting then that we consider the lives and public work of our departed friends in that illumination.

They whose names we inscribe to-day in the Nation's pantheon form an illustrious company. Singly, in their diverse origins and in the varying degrees of struggle through which they attained the honor of here serving their people and their country, they exemplified all the finest traditions of America's equality of opportunity. Collectively, in their steadfast devotion to the common good, in their united purpose to serve the public welfare without fear and without reproach, they furnish a reassuring fulfillment of that prayer of hope expressed by Washington a century and a half ago, when the stalwart builders of the Republic who had labored by his side in laying the foundations and in beginning the superstructure, one by one laid down their working tools and went to their eternal rest, and he said:

> Thus some of the pillars of the Revolution fall. Others are mouldering by insensible degrees. May our country never want props to support the glorious fabric.

Truly, those we commemorate to-day, in the character of their public service and in the quality of their manhood, were of that never-ending, never-failing succession of props, upholding in glory and in security the destiny of the Republic.

Jefferson said of Washington:

> The whole of his character was in its mass perfect, in nothing bad, in a few things indifferent.

And we may in truth apply those words to these 19. It is not given to me to eulogize them individually. They stand together in the honor we would pay them, even as they mingled with us here. Joined thus are the veteran, who in many repeated elections received the acclaim and mandate of his people, and the neophyte, who stood but for a moment at the threshold and was gone. Joined with them all is he who, laying his gavel down forever, descended from the Speaker's dais to stand among the rest. All a goodly, devoted company, which we and the Nation could ill afford to lose when the way was in any wise obscure!

Out of that association, which is the rare privilege and the greatest recompense of our service here, we learn to mark the true stature of men. We come thus to realize almost universally that, when the white fire of truly national need blazes forth, the dross of sectionalism, of petty partisanship, of individual selfishness, is consumed, and pure gold is found in every character. In that pure gold we set the jewel of our remembrance.

Said Washington of the reputation of public men:

> The good opinion of honest men, friends of freedom, and well-wishers of mankind, wherever they may be born or happen to reside, is the only kind of reputation a wise man would ever desire.

Of the triumph of principle he said:

> In times of turbulence, when the passions are afloat, calm reason is swallowed up in the extremes to which measures are attempted to be carried; but when those subside, and its empire is resumed, the man who acts from principle, who pursues the path of truth, moderation, and justice, will regain his influence.

Regarding the placing of duty above popularity, his words were these:

> Though I prize as I ought the good opinion of my fellow citizens, yet, if I know myself, I would not seek to retain popularity at the expense of one social duty or moral virtue.

Of public duty in crisis times he said:

> The hour is certainly come when party disputes and dissensions should subside, when every man, especially those in office, should, with hand and heart, pull the same way and with their whole strength.

Measure by that yardstick of the immortal Washington the lives and public service of these colleagues of ours, who labored here to complete and preserve the structure of human society which he founded. Observe how that yardstick emphasizes their high stature. And while we have it in our hands, recalling that never were sound props more greatly needed to "uphold the glorious fabric," let us measure ourselves.

So we approach now the final thought. It is not only that we speak in eulogy of the honored dead. We thus offer the poor comfort of our sympathy to those who mourn in those intimate recesses of the heart into which even the sincerest friendship can not fully go. Always on such occasions the thought recurs and is repeated that words, though winged with all of human sympathy, falter and fail. But I like, in this hallowed, bicentennial year of Washington, to think of those who have ceased to labor here, in this building where he laid the corner stone, as being still of his devoted company in the eternal service of our country.

Reason—

Said Washington on an occasion of sorrow—

> Reason, religion, and philosophy teach us to submit; but it is time alone that can ameliorate the pangs of humanity and soften its woes.

And on the thought of time I come finally to a parable which has to do with the vital part which such lives and public service as we now honor must ever have in the welfare of our people. It is a parable which comes to my mind whenever I see youth in training for usefulness, and when I ponder the end of lives devoted to good works.

I stood alone in the presence of the oldest living thing on all the earth, a towering sequoia tree in the midst of the California mountains. It was evening, and the shadows were those of a cathedral. For that tree age was not reckoned by years, nor only by centuries. Thousands of yearly cycles had passed over it in sunshine and in storm. Since it had come into being, the pyramids had arisen out of vast dreams of glory and the toil of slaves, and become the sepultures of forgotten kings. Persia, Babylon, and Greece had known glory and decay. The eagles of Rome had screamed at the gates of Jerusalem, and the Son of Man had died there on the cross that all men might have eternal life. The epoch of Roman power had passed like a shadow over the wheat. The ancient had given way to the medieval. The medieval had merged into that more modern day when a bold, inspired adventurer breasted unknown oceans and found a new world in which that great tree, already grown immeasurably old, arose in silence and majesty, still hidden on a distant and undiscovered coast.

Yet the giant sequoia lived on, and in its later years the day came when it, symbol of eternity as it was, became embraced in the outstretched boundaries of the youngest of great nations, founded upon principles of justice and liberty even more eternal.

No other tree than the sequoia has more than a brief fraction of such a span of life. For ordinary trees a century or less brings the disintegration age. Their very sap comes to be the conveyer of disease. Fungus and rot attack them, and the winds lay them low. But overpassing them all, spanning the death of countless generations of lesser trees, that great sequoia has stood secure. Lightning could scar but never overthrow. Fire could but leave the mark of its passing, but not destroy.

So I sought the secret of its deathless age, and I recalled that in the place of such sap as flows in the veins of common trees the everlasting sequoia contains within itself an essence of such power that it is its own preservative.

It is so with our Republic. The wisdom of its founders; the justice of its institutions; the devotion of its people, young and old; the divinity of its purpose; and, not least of all, the service, the character, the guiding example of such public men as these 19 of hallowed memory—all these constitute that essence of preservation which, in the providence of God, shall forever flow in the living veins of our beloved country.

So we bid our colleagues who have gone on before us, farewell—in sorrow but with uplifted hearts. We mourn with their loved ones; and in bereavement we recall that, while all men must meet death somewhere on the way, these our colleagues were privileged to meet it on the open road, in the day of their service, with their honors full upon them. Generous, true friends every one, and very gallant gentlemen, who at the last were able to join voices with that other valiant spirit who sang:

Under the wide and starry sky,
Dig the grave and let me lie.
Glad did I live and gladly die
And I laid me down with a will.

This be the verse you grave for me:
Here he lies where he longed to be;
Home is the sailor, home from the sea,
And the hunter home from the hill.

Mr. Leonard Davis sang "Farewell."

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, a Representative from the State of Alabama, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, OF ALABAMA

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, since the selection of the Seventy-second Congress 3 Senators and 16 Representatives have been summoned by a very grim sergeant-at-arms to take their departure for another forum. We are here to pay our immemorial homage to our comrades who have gone away. Of necessity our eulogy must be composite and not individual.

If we were content to accept Cardinal Wolsey's unhappy lament, this ceremonial might well begin and end with his words:

This is the state of man: to-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hopes; to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost,
And, when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a-ripening, nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do

To accept that bitter philosophy as a summary of life's achievements would make this an hour of despair—it would have us kneel at an altar devoid of the solace of assuring sacrament, whereas in its accepted spiritual significance it is an hour of triumph and reconsecration. We are here to honor men who honored themselves and the institutions of the Republic.

It appears to have become the popular fashion of late for Congress to be the target at which is aimed the bitter, if not vindictive, shaft of every calumny—the victim of every comedian's artless wit, the jibe and jest, indeed, of all that company of scribes who seem to have forgotten every kindly word in the vocabulary of praise.

We do not need to appeal to the living to vindicate the type of men who serve in the Congress of the United States. That this is, and has been, the training ground for many of our country's immortals is attested by the fact that 25 of the figures in yonder hall of fame are effigies of former Members of Congress. We are content to abide the judgment of posterity on a roll call of the dead.

Let us for a moment take the measure of these men. Let us appraise the average background and environment that nurtured their youth, the ambitions which fired their manhood, the qualities of heart and mind which in the esteem of their fellow countrymen made them worthy to take station in that place where Clay and Calhoun and Webster and Lincoln had schooled their polemic genius "in a time remote."

The majority of them no doubt had their origin in plain places; out of a frugal and wholesome environment they grew. The common schools, the modest academies, the State university sheltered and inspired their younger ambitions to know more of this vast old world, of its men and measures, of its political philosophy and social institutions.

In maturer years the ambition for public service entered into their dreams, and it was given them to know that under our benign system of government, in the real lottery of life, there are no marked cards. That neither rank, nor pedigree, nor prerogative casts its sinister shadow across the thoroughfare of aspiration, and that the courageous man had a fair chance to cleave his way through all obstructions. Then the hard apprenticeship in the minor honors—the legislature, the district attorneyship, responsible business executive. And yet always out yonder a little farther away the vision of the National Capitol.

But not quite yet; the preparation is not complete. The hustings is a hard taskmaster; the opponent will be inquisitorial and relentless. What, ambitious man, do you know of the Federal Government? How deeply have you acquainted yourself with the essence and interpretation of its Constitution? How learned are you in the origin of party principles and government and the intricacies of their application to existing controversies? What are the ordered processes of your reasoning that qualify you to engage in congressional debate? And then the yet more intense application in the school of practical politics, the formation of favorable factions, the arduous exactions of the campaign, and then victory and vindication.

It may be fairly stated then that it is no little thing to come into this Chamber with the confidence and approval of a great constituency, bearing a commission emblematic of their trust and their affection. How contemptible the creature who would deliberately degrade such noble credentials. How exceptional the number of those who have been guilty of betrayal.

Thus briefly prefaced in the abstract is the typical beginning of the service of our brethren, and we are assembled to-day for appropriate meditation upon their end.

In between are the brief or long and patient years of extended service. Theirs the effort to see to it that representative and constitutional government for a free people did not succumb, that equality of opportunity under the law should always survive; that the restraint of the mighty and the protection of the weak be a legal fact and not an academic fiction. Theirs to hold to the ancient faith of the founders—to preserve the old fidelities of policy, to revere the precedents honorably established—but likewise to pioneer in new fields of remedy and procedure when the old order grew archaic and unstable. And there lies one of the distressing problems of congressional service; to make decision to abandon an established tenet of policy honored during the reach of years, but now found inadequate to meet the evolution of events and the fickle currents of public opinion. It is no easy thing to remove "the ancient landmarks thy fathers have set." And neither is it a trivial thing to choose a safer outpost than the old fortress to be abandoned.

Verily these men loved America with an affection which "hoped, and endured, and was patient." Theirs was of that same type of devotion which inspired the noble apostrophe of Richelieu:

All things for France,
Lo! My eternal maxim,
The vital axle of the restless wheels
Which bear me on—

Fortunately it is not given to us to raise the iron curtain of the major mystery and see them wherever they are. But we may be permitted to surmise that they yet may make forensic war; that their disciplined and ingenuous faculties, though upon far nobler themes, may yet engage in challenge and reply; or having in that serener sphere put off the burden of issues joined make penance for their wasted words in this life below.

How gracious a thing it is that there are no limitations upon the reach or, indeed, the ecstacy of our imagination in the exploration of the realm of the spirit.

Accepting such license, is it impossible to conceive that our departed friends have carried to the elder statesmen late tidings of the state of the Union?

To Washington that in his bicentennial a grateful Republic of 125,000,000 souls pays every human homage to its first Commander in Chief. To Jefferson that the declaration and the bill of rights, twin children of his brain, are yet the torch and sanctuary of human freedom. To Jackson that his "by the eternals" courage yet fires the hearts of men. To Lincoln that dissolution of the Republic expired forever at Appomattox and that his martyrdom ultimately wrought the healing of the Nation. To Wilson that his league still lives and, though yet aloof from us, has held the confidence of the majority of mankind.

In the beginning, I said that this should be an hour of triumph. It is so because it is an hour of peace. Buried deep in the heart of those commemorative roses, for this day at least, are all ancient grudges, all petty political and partisan feuds. The cadences of the hymns here sung have borne away the clamant harshness of all factional pride. The very softness of the silence within the Chamber is more eloquent in its subtle eulogy than are the phrases coined in the frenzy of debate by the mental ingenuity of men.

There is no occasion in this hour of reverie and contemplation to wear an armor for defense, or to lay hold of the lance for attack, or to use our little measures of intrigue. We lay by the weapons of warfare and gird on the mantles of amity and reconciliation.

On this day, surrounded by the generous exaltation of these obsequies, how feeble a fiction is that space out there called the center aisle. Yesterday the symbol of separation, to-day it is obliterated by the actual consciousness that a mere party label is a miserable device with which to measure the merits of a man.

Others will pay individual tribute to our departed friends on the printed page of our memorial volume. Justification could be found for singling out the eminent and outstanding public services of our lamented and beloved Speaker, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH; and yet, knowing him as we did, understanding the democracy of his nature, if he could be consulted, he would say, "No; not that; no word of praise for me that might disparage the others. We were all yokefellows in a common service, trying to pull together the burdens of our office."

There come many disillusionments with this public life. The way of ambition is not the way of peace. Real attainments here do not come by the processes of tranquillity and repose. The laborious route is filled with the hard stones of arduous labor, grinding details, petty and ofttimes discreditable jealousies, and disappointed aspirations.

But out of the welter of such strife and turmoil there comes to us all the one priceless compensation of real friendships, mutual confidence and respect. We held such sentiments toward all those gentlemen who have gone away. They have gone on an indefinite leave of absence, "on important business, the search of an answer to that question to which all the centuries have given no response: 'If a man die, shall he live again?'"

How can we find it in our hearts to believe that God will break faith with all the sons of men on the assurance of the words of Genesis:

> And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul.

We may with confidence and assurance accept the philosophy of a sentence from Ingall's eulogy on Ben Hill, of Georgia:

> Every man's life is the center of a circle. Within its narrow confines he is potential; beyond he perishes. And if immortality be a splendid but delusive dream, if the incompleteness of every human career, even the longest and most fortunate, be not perfected and supplemented after its termination here, then he who fears to die should dread to live, for life would be a tragedy more desolate and inexplicable than death.

Cornet solo, "Abide With Me," rendered by Mr. John Walker and the United States Navy Band Orchestra.

BENEDICTION

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following benediction:

And now may grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit abide with us and keep us always. Amen.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES

DWIGHT WHITNEY MORROW

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I include the following tribute of Hon. HAMILTON F. KEAN, United States Senator from New Jersey, to Hon. DWIGHT W. MORROW:

On October 5, 1931, there passed into the Great Beyond the soul of the late Senator from New Jersey, my colleague and friend, DWIGHT WHITNEY MORROW. His passing closed a long and brilliant career of useful public service to his own State, to the Nation, and to the people of other nations, and bereft the world of an international figure whose wide sympathies, keen intellect, sound judgments, and wise counsels were never more greatly needed to help civilization find its way out of an economic and social morass.

Edgar Guest's lines well described this man who has gone from us:

> "Men are of two kinds and he
> Was of the kind I'd like to be.
> Some preach their virtues, and a few
> Express their lives by what they do.
> That sort was he. No flowery phrase
> Or glibly spoken words of praise
> Won friends for him. He wasn't cheap
> Or shallow, but his course ran deep,
> And it was pure. You know the kind.
> Not many in a life you find
> Whose deeds outrun their words so far
> That more than what they seem they are."

Like so many other American boys who have won deserved fame by ability, courage, and character, DWIGHT W. MORROW was the son of poor parents. Born in Huntington, W. Va., January 11, 1873, he was the descendant of pre-Revolutionary Virginia patriots on his father's side, while his maternal ancestors were among the pioneers who settled Kentucky. His father, a school-teacher, sacrificed himself to educate his children, of whom the entire five who survived each received a normal-school or college education, and all five taught school at some time in their careers.

DWIGHT W. MORROW early betrayed the scholarly qualities which marked him throughout life when he graduated from high school with honors at the age of 14. Too young and frail to immediately enter college, he worked four years as an errand boy in the county treasurer's office at Pittsburgh, the family having moved to Pennsylvania. An older brother had won an appointment to the Military Academy at West Point, and at the age of 18 DWIGHT entered a competitive examination for the same place. He won the examination, but the Representative from the district was unwilling to make the appointment and have two boys from the same family in the acadamy at the same time. It was not in the character of DWIGHT W. MORROW to be defeated by circumstances, even at that early age, and a few months after the denial of his military aspirations he entered Amherst College, where among his fellow students were three whose lives and careers were destined to continue closely linked with his own—Calvin Coolidge; Harlan F. Stone, now a Justice of the Supreme Court; and BERTRAND H. SNELL, present Member of the House of Representatives.

The scholarly tendencies evidenced in high school developed and marked young MORROW's college course. His especial proficiency in mathematics and philosophy helped to qualify him for his later success in the fields of law, finance, diplomacy, and statesmanship.

As many other great Americans have done, DWIGHT MORROW worked his way through college, tutoring other students and editing a literary magazine. He won most of the prizes in mathematics and graduated at the head of his class. With the cash prizes he bought railroad tickets for his parents to go to Amherst to see him graduate. His oratorical ability was manifest in his college days, and at his graduation he won the two prizes for public speaking. His classmates voted him the member of the class most likely to succeed. In his contest he voted for Calvin Coolidge, and Coolidge voted for him.

After graduation from Amherst, young MORROW secured a clerkship in the county offices at Pittsburgh, where his father was principal of the normal school, and saved enough money to enter Columbia Law School in 1896. Here he again worked his way through by tutoring. Graduating from the law school, he became a clerk in the law offices of Reed, Simpson, Thatcher & Barnum in New York, at the head of which firm was Thomas B. Reed, former Speaker of the House of Representatives. Although other law students were glad to secure such clerkships without salary, Mr. MORROW explained to Mr. Simpson of the firm that he could not afford to do this, and he was paid $50 a month to start. In seven years he was a member of the firm. As a lawyer, his faculty for stripping issues of nonessentials, bringing about agreement between conflicting interests, and organizing new enterprises won for him the confidence and respect of leading financiers, and he was invited to become a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., where he became an invaluable adviser to the financial world.

When the Great War broke out credits for all the allied nations were arranged through Morgan & Co., and they became suddenly the financial center of the maelstrom. In this emergency the knowledge of higher mathematics which Mr. MORROW had gained from Professor Olds at Amherst aided him in solving many of the intricate problems of international financing involved in the process of changing the United States from a debtor to a creditor Nation. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, appointed him as the head of the war-savings campaign in New Jersey, and he helped to originate the national thrift campaign. His speeches were used by the war-savings and Liberty loan committees throughout the country. President Wilson made him a member of the Allied Maritime Transport Council and the Allied Board of Supplies. Much of the work of these commissions, which consisted in amalgamating sea-transportation facilities and allotting them to the nations on a basis of largest value to the allied cause, was done in secret. DWIGHT MORROW worked best that way. He sought results, accomplishment—not publicity or honors. In fact, he refused a military commission offered him in recognition of his services to the American Expeditionary Forces, but could not refuse the distinguished-service medal given him by his own country nor the decorations presented by France, Italy, and Greece in token of their appreciation of his war work.

The drafting of DWIGHT W. MORROW for difficult public tasks began in his own State many years ago and became a National and State habit. In 1917 Gov. Walter E. Edge, now ambassador to France, drafted Mr. MORROW to serve upon the New Jersey prison inquiry commission, of which Mr. MORROW became chairman. There had been an indignant demand from the citizens and newspapers of the Senate of New Jersey for a radical reformation of the treatment of inmates of the State penal and correctional institutions.

The commission, under Mr. MORROW's leadership, made an exhaustive study of the subject and in 1918 made its report to Governor Edge. The report consisted of two volumes, one of which was a history of the penal and correctional institutions of the State of New Jersey from Colonial times down. The legislature of the State adopted the recommendations of the commission and set up by statute the department of charities and corrections, the name of which was later changed to the New Jersey State Board of Institutions and Agencies. Mr. MORROW served as chairman of the new department until 1920, when he retired. The system of institutional operation and control which was established and is being conducted in New Jersey as a result of the work of the prison inquiry commission has served as a model for other States after they have made extensive studies of systems elsewhere. In 1920 the national committee on prisons and prison labor gave Mr. MORROW a gold medal in recognition of his accomplishments in prison reform in the State of New Jersey.

In September, 1925, President Coolidge summoned Mr. MORROW to service as a member of the board which President Coolidge created for the purpose of "making a study of the best means of developing and applying aircraft in national defense." The board consisted of nine members, who elected Mr. MORROW their chairman, and was known as the President's aircraft board. The board made an intensive study of the subject during the fall of 1925, and at the end of November rendered its report to President Coolidge, which he transmitted to Congress and which Congress adopted almost in toto. Through his service as chairman of this board and also as trustee of the Daniel Guggenheim Fund for the Promotion of Aeronautics, Mr. MORROW helped to build and strengthen aviation.

When in 1927 President Coolidge appointed Mr. MORROW ambassador to Mexico, the relations between that country and our own were so strained as to threaten in the minds of many a continuance of friendly diplomatic intercourse. Differences of opinion over certain Mexican laws, particularly those affecting petroleum, were very acute. In selecting Mr. MORROW as ambassador to Mexico President Coolidge threw upon him the Herculean task of settling these questions and at the same time of restoring relations between the two countries to friendliness. How thoroughly he won the confidence of the Mexican people by his friendliness, sympathy, and understanding, his rare tact and diplomacy, and how successful he was in his handling of the difficult task which he had undertaken, is too well remembered to need repeating here.

In January, 1928, Mr. MORROW went to Habana, Cuba, as a member of the Sixth Pan American Conference, having been appointed to that conference by President Coolidge as one of the representatives of the United States.

While concluding his work in Mexico and preparing to act as a delegate to the London Naval Conference, Mr. MORROW was drafted by the Republican Party, to which he had long given allegiance, for more service to his own State. A candidate for the United States Senate was needed who could not only ably represent the people but could also reconcile differences within the party and insure party success. Told over the long-distance telephone in Mexico City of this need and of the agreement of party leaders that he was the one man who was their unanimous choice, Mr. Morrow accepted the summons as another call to duty.

Nominated by an overwhelming vote in the Republican primaries, Senator MORROW was elected by a plurality of 250,000 at the polls. His political beliefs were well summed up in his few campaign speeches, from which I quote these sentences:

"Despite all criticism of party government, we have found no way of making democratic government function without party machinery and party responsibility."

"If I am elected to the Senate, my only obligation will run to the voters of the State and to my own conscience."

And again:

"The constituency may properly demand of its representative that he be a public servant, but they would and should despise him if he agreed to become a slave."

As a Senator, Mr. MORROW's all-too-brief career was marked by the same earnest application to his duties, the same studious effort to understand questions and issues and rid them of nonessentials, and the same tolerant sympathy for the views of others, though he differed from them, as had characterized his career in college, in the law, and in the realms of business and diplomacy.

In addition to his work and interests, to which I have already alluded, for many years he was a trustee of Amherst College, from which he graduated in 1895. He was also a trustee of Hampton Institute, a director of Union Theological Seminary, of the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and of the Russell Sage Foundation. He had been a director of the Commonwealth Fund, a trustee of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, and was a Regent of Smithsonian Institution at the time he was elected to the United States Senate.

Few men in any generation have given themselves with greater zeal and more patriotic devotion to the undivided service of their country and their fellow men than did DWIGHT W. MORROW in the days when the world was mad with war, and since. Where there was need for help in a worthy cause he never failed to heed the summons. One of his great services to humanity was as chairman of the committee which raised funds for the relief of earthquake and fire victims in Japan. His last public utterance, only a few hours before his great spirit burst the bonds of his frail body and passed to the great beyond, was an appeal for relief funds to help Jewish people.

DWIGHT MORROW's death is a great loss to his devoted wife, who has shared his pleasures and his trials for so many years. His death is a great loss to his children, to whom he was a father and companion and to whom he has been a counsellor and guide. His death is a great loss to the State of New Jersey, whose devoted servant he was, but it is a greater loss to the Nation, which in these times can ill afford to lose a man with such clear vision, sound judgment, and constant and able devotion.

As an epitome of his life, I might quote Kipling:

"He scarce had need to doff his pride or slough the dross of Earth, E'en as he trod that day to God so walked he from his birth."

MEETING IN MEMORY OF THE LATE DWIGHT W. MORROW HELD BY HIS LONDON FRIENDS AT THE AMERICAN EMBASSY IN LONDON ON WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1931—HIS EXCELLENCY THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR (GEN. CHARLES G. DAWES) IN THE CHAIR

His Excellency the American Ambassador, General DAWES. We all meet as the personal friends of Senator MORROW. There are very few in this room—if, indeed, there is anyone—of whose friendship Senator MORROW himself has not spoken to me. It is very difficult for me to speak of him in any way but in terms of personal bereavement—in fact, it is difficult for me to speak at all. I recognize, as you all do, that his passing is more than a personal loss; it is a loss to the American Nation and to the world. Nature seldom decorates a man of genius with those human qualities and that exceptional character which were possessed by DWIGHT MORROW and which are really needed to give high ability its greatest effectiveness and usefulness in the world. DWIGHT MORROW's genius was such as won recognition in any company in which he might be; but there was always an equal recognition of his lovable human qualities and his strong character. Those qualities of which Sir Arthur Salter recently wrote in a very impressive tribute to him, which was published the other day, were qualities which at once struck anyone who was his associate. The first was an uncanny power in a discussion with any man, no matter what his personal feelings may have been, to put himself in the other man's place. There are many here who have been in negotiations with him, and no one of them could have failed to notice his predominant quality of fairness. He would never enter into any discussion in which he did not see the other man's side and make the other man feel that he knew all the difficulties, the embarrassments and the impediments which had to be faced and overcome before the other could come to his way of thinking. He was recognized as the first in practically every kind of association into which he went—technical, political, and civilian.

Seeing Gen. Sir Travers Clarke here, I remember at one time in the war when I went to British Army headquarters he asked me if I knew Mr. DWIGHT MORROW. He added, "I wish you would bring him to headquarters the next time you come, because I should like to see him and know him. I am told at the admiralty that his diagnosis of the allied shipping situation in the world was such that it determined admiralty policy." He was a mathematical genius, as Poincaré and Painleve are, and was masterful in solving technical questions. Sir Arthur Salter, Sir William Malkin, and Mr. Craigie, who are with us, have all worked with him in such matters and will testify to his unusual ability in technical discussions, as well as to that faculty for putting himself in the other man's place which is never easy in technical differences which especially involve a pride in opinion. Then, above all, he would trust others. He never dealt with anybody without expecting him to trust to his own honesty, nor without his own trust in the honesty of him with whom he was negotiating. That made him immensely effective, for human qualities have just as powerful an effect in negotiations between nations and classes as in negotiations between individuals. In the Paris papers there appeared a tribute to DWIGHT MORROW, written by Mr. Robert Davis, which expresses what I am trying to say so much better than I can that in closing I will read a portion of it. Mr. Davis, at one time his pastor, was always an intimate friend. He said:

"DWIGHT MORROW was a small-town man, as Abraham Lincoln was a small-town man. He viewed the people about him as interesting and separate individuals, not as a human mass. He knew his neighbors. He knew why they worried, about their children, their investments, about their gardens, their family pets. He seemed to like individuals for themselves. He seemed to be reflecting upon what would help them to live more generously, about how they could get ahead in the world, how they could conquer their personal failings. During his mature life DWIGHT MORROW had three notable characteristics. He kept the mind of a mathematician, which had made him a prodigy as a boy, but this mind found its pleasure in the dissection of social misunderstandings. He delighted in the orderly analysis of a situation, removing the extraneous, layer by layer, like a surgeon; going deeper and yet deeper, until he confronted a single defined issue. A second characteristic was his small-town psychology. He approached any stranger, any stranger nation, any opposing politician as a small-town citizen meets a trusted neighbor. He assumed that they were like himself. He was prepared to interpret them, to represent them, because they were familiar to him. His third trait was an instinct for putting himself in the other man's place. Without effort he ignored himself and his own side of the question. The whole center of the picture was occupied by the other man's rights and advantages. Feeling his unforced sincerity, his opponents were disarmed; suspicion relaxed. They felt that they were with a friend. It was the union of these three traits that made DWIGHT MORROW a negotiator such as has seldom been equaled. If DWIGHT MORROW had lived it is possible that he would have reached a very high place in our Government. Should this have happened, he would have kept on dissecting every situation, without haste or timidity, interpreting men to themselves and to one another, showing them that, after all, there was some simple remedy, that quarreling would not help. As advocate, as ambassador, as Government envoy, as patriot, he showed people that if one's enlightened self-interest were known, there would be little cause for rivalry or anger."

I want also to read a few words which ex-President Coolidge, who held him in deep affection and respect, wrote of him but a year ago. He closes his tribute to Senator MORROW in these words:

"I first met him as the representative of the great mass of our fellow citizens which we call the people. There he will always remain, just one of them, unencumbered by his property, thinking their thoughts, working, working tremendously for their success. I have seen him develop into a ripe scholar, an able lawyer, a great business man, a wise statesman, and a devoted husband, father, and patriot. When most men would retire he seems always just beginning—beginning some new service for his friends and neighbors, for his country, and for humanity. It is the glory of the United States that it can produce such citizens."

I have asked a few here to say something of Senator MORROW, and I will call upon one of his very dear friends, the ambassador of France, M. de Fleuriau.

His Excellency the French Ambassador, M. DE FLEURIAU. I associate myself with all that General Dawes has said with reference to the late Senator MORROW. I came first in contact with him in 1917 when he came to London during the war. There are many here who worked with him and with me at that critical time which has left very, very interesting memories. The characteristic of DWIGHT MORROW, as he comes to my mind, was good will. He felt a very earnest good will toward the work he was doing and an extraordinary good will toward anyone who was associated in that work. That good will was helped in the most remarkable way by a sort of movement in his mind. He showed an extraordinary activity of mind—what we call in French "verve." He had verve, and he had courage, which is always a great characteristic in these serious times of our lives. He had, too, what was very peculiar, a curious absent-mindedness which added to his personal charm. I was his friend. I did not see very much of him for several years, but I had twice, while we were separated, some very delicate communications to make in his country. I wrote to him, and he gave me help for which not only I but my Government was very grateful. During the great financial difficulties we had he was a very good adviser to us. When I saw him last in the politics of his country he had become a Senator. I had then great hope for his advance in those politics, but now those hopes are shattered, and I feel very deeply the loss of this gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask his excellency, the Italian ambassador to add a word.

His Excellency the Italian Ambassador, Signor BORDONARO. I am very grateful to the American ambassador for having asked me to be present at this meeting to-day and given me the opportunity of paying a personal tribute to the memory of Mr. DWIGHT MORROW. I was not an old friend of Mr. MORROW. I only met him for the first time when he came over for the naval conference last year. But since then I was fortunate enough to be on the best terms of friendly relations with him. I saw him last March when he was leaving to spend a holiday in Italy; he was to stay some weeks in my native town of Palermo. Mr. DWIGHT MORROW was not only a great American citizen and statesman, but he was one of those great international brains whose value is particularly needed in our present difficulties all over the world. His loss is not only a loss for America but a universal loss. The news of Mr. DWIGHT MORROW's disappearance was very deeply felt in Italy, where he had many friends. He was considered as a true friend of Italy and had several opportunities to prove himself one. I wish that my sincere tribute to his memory to-day should be taken also as a tribute from the country I have the honor to represent.

The CHAIRMAN. I will now ask the Japanese ambassador, who was a close friend of Mr. MORROW, to speak.

His Excellency the Japanese Ambassador, Mr. T. MATSUDAIRA. It is with heartfelt emotion that I speak a very few words to pay my tribute to the memory of a great American, our mutual friend, the late Senator DWIGHT MORROW. It was about four years ago when I was in Washington that I first met Mr. MORROW. Even before my personal acquaintance with him I had known that he had interested himself in the promotion of international good understanding among the nations, that he had paid great attention to the Pacific problems, and that he had constantly worked, though not officially, or ostensibly, in the cause of friendship between America and my country. Even in that first interview with him I was greatly impressed with his genial character, his legal mind, his common sense, and his high ideals of statesmanship. This impression was deepened when I met him again in London as a colleague at the time of the naval conference of London last year. I had other occasions in which to be in association with him closely and came to appreciate that his inclusion in the American delegation was an important factor in the successful issue of that historic conference. His ability and character asserted themselves most remarkably when difficulties and complications beset the path of the deliberations. His keen mind, his perseverance, and his remarkable power of easing the tense atmosphere, whenever it was endangered, were most essential in those anxious days.

The world is now passing through a very difficult time. Great questions, unexampled in history, are confronting us. The questions of finance and disarmament are demanding the wholehearted exercise of human energy, enterprise, and statesmanship. It is a time when a man of Mr. MORROW's experience, conviction, foresight, and strength is most sorely needed. His untimely death is not only lamentable for his own country but for all the world. The cause of the peace and prosperity of the whole of humanity will suffer in the loss of this great American statesman.

The CHAIRMAN. I will now ask the Mexican minister to say a word.

The Mexican Minister, Doctor ORTIZ. May I offer my humble homage here to the memory of the late Mr. MORROW, looking back to the time when he was ambassador in Mexico and to his many personal virtues.

It was at a difficult time that he came, as the highest representative of the United States, to my country; and he accomplished his task very well indeed, bringing to it a determined will to smooth away the obstacles in the path of our traditional friendship. I dare to say that it was his good will and his readiness to see and understand our national problems, not less than the indefatigable devotion he put into his task, that was the clue to his success. If to these qualities are added the personal charm and frankness of Mr. MORROW, which gained for him without effort the confidence and friendship of the Mexicans, it is easy to understand that he made one of the best American ambassadors we have had in Mexico.

Being myself absent from Mexico for a long time, I only had the opportunity of making his acquaintance during his last visit to London. I consider it a privilege to be able to add my tribute to-day, from my personal and pleasing memory, to that of the others who have spoken. It often happens that foreigners who come to Mexico with the good wish to conquer hearts are themselves conquered. Whether or not that explains the kind and sincere way in which Mr. MORROW always referred to my country, we could not but appreciate it greatly.

Through all the many worries of his busy life, endeavoring to do good to his country and to help humanity in the solution of the many problems of the day, he longed in his heart for peace and rest; and hoped to find them in his pretty, tiny house at Cuernavaca, which he was keeping for that purpose. If his premature death deprived him of the well-deserved rest he had planned, in a higher form he found it at last, leaving to his country and his fellowmen the fruits of his righteousness and of his services for mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask Mr. Montagu Norman, one of Mr. MORROW's very old friends, to say something.

Mr. MONTAGU NORMAN. This is not only a unique occasion, the like of which I believe not any of us has seen before, but we must recognize that it is also an occasion of sadness and of emotion. I, for my part, and perhaps the rest of you, his personal friends, can not contemplate the death of DWIGHT MORROW, or the world without him, without wondering what death means, without thinking, as we are all accustomed to think when death comes near to us, of mortality and immortality, and whether indeed in spite of his death we shall continue without his good will and succor.

But that is not the side to which I wish to direct your attention. I have been wondering, as I came along here, why it is that we, as the ambassador has said, his personal friends, are meeting together in this unique manner on this unique occasion. We have heard it said, and I know well, that Senator MORROW was eminent as a mathematician, eminent I believe as a lawyer, as a banker, as a Senator, and certainly eminent in his desire and craving for public service. Yet I venture to say that if it were only for those reasons that we knew him we should not be gathered together as we are. It was because of another quality which he had, and which we all of us recognize, although perhaps we never put it into words. That quality was that we met him and he met us as a man. That is the category in which we knew him. That is the way we met him. If you may think that the term man is inadequate, I will say as a gentleman, or as a nobleman. Allow me to go one step farther. It was not the things that he did, but what he was, as I say, that endeared him to us, nor was it because he was clever or farsighted, or imaginative, or any of those qualities which we recognize and many of which have already been mentioned this afternoon, but from my point of view the reason I feel and have felt toward him as I do is that he made me feel that those were my qualities and not his. The very difference in dealing or speaking with Senator MORROW, whether when he was a host, or whether when he was in business, or whether when it was merely passing the time of day, was that whereas at the beginning I felt a worm, at the end I felt a man. As I went along listening and talking to him I could not but be conscious each time that he lifted me from the dull and unimaginative way in which I was accustomed to approach many of the subjects which we discussed, and brought me, as it were, on to that level which, so far, I had believed he alone could occupy. Mr. Ambassador, first of all, it is because he was a man and a gentleman and a nobleman that I treasure his memory. Secondly, it is because for all his qualities he, with a generous hand, imparted them to me, and because I know that I have been the better for such contact as I have had with him. So I have gladly accepted your invitation to pay my small tribute to him, to mourn with you his death, but to be thankful for his life.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask Mr. R. L. Craigie, of the Foreign Office, who was very many times associated with Mr. MORROW, to say a word.

Mr. R. L. CRAIGIE. After what has been said here this afternoon I feel it would be almost a presumption on my part to attempt to pay any general tribute to DWIGHT MORROW's character, life, and career. But there were two periods in his career when I had an especially advantageous opportunity of watching him at work, and I may perhaps refer briefly to those periods. The first was the period of his ambassadorship in Mexico City. When he went to Mexico City there were many difficulties in the way of American-Mexican relations, many big and difficult problems which had so far eluded solution. To a third party they seemed almost insoluble, and yet when Mr. MORROW arrived at Mexico City he set to work with courage and energy to master those problems, and not only to master them but to win the confidence of those with whom he was negotiating. I feel sure the Mexican minister will bear me out when I say that, viewed from our neutral standpoint, in those three years, when he was ambassador in Mexico City, a complete change in the situation was brought about. When I say from the neutral standpoint, of course, we were not entirely neutral because we, with our great interests in Mexico, benefited greatly from those happy changes.

The second period during which I was able to see him at work at closer quarters was during the London Naval Conference When he arrived here he could have had no previous, or very little previous, knowledge of those difficult technical and complex questions which we had to discuss, connected with guns, categories, displacements, and so on. Yet within a very short time of the opening of the conference, there was, I believe, no man who had a better mastery of those problems. He set to work with his singleness of purpose, his tact and his resourcefulness to help him in the solution of those problems one by one. I am sure Sir Maurice Hankey will bear me out when I say that that conference owed a very deep debt of gratitude indeed to DWIGHT MORROW. When he crossed the ocean to come to this country he had already won our great esteem and admiration. When he left, he carried away with him our deep affection as well.

The CHAIRMAN. We will conclude the meeting by hearing one more friend of Mr. DWIGHT MORROW—Mr. Charles Selden, president of the American Press Association.

Mr. CHARLES A. SELDEN. Mr. Ambassador, the last time I saw Senator MORROW was in April of this year in the public lobby of the Parliament buildings. Much to my surprise, I saw the Senator standing in the middle of a long, dreary queue of ordinary sightseers, waiting for the policeman to let them go upstairs to the gallery after the House of Commons had finished saying its prayers. Of course, I was surprised, and I said: "Why, a Senator, an ambassador, and a delegate to the naval conference ought not to be in a queue like this; you ought to be going comfortably to the distinguished strangers' gallery." He said: "Well, I am not an ambassador any more, I am only a Senator, and the naval conference was over a year ago. I do not want to be a distinguished stranger; I just want to go upstairs and hear Snowden." He did, and he sat throughout the afternoon five rows back from where the foreign correspondents sit. The incident was characteristic of the things in Senator MORROW that made him beloved of newspaper men wherever they met together, whether in Mexico or in London, in New York or in Washington, or in his own State of New Jersey, where he had before that been elected by the unprecedented majority of 200,000 to the Senate, chiefly because he had the courage to say to America what no other Republican candidate throughout the United States had dared to say. We liked him also because he did not know how to boast, even when he was telling us about the big affairs in which he himself had participated. The nearest he ever came to it—he never tried—was when he told us that he had persuaded some of his British colleagues to work on a Good Friday and through the Easter week-end. As a result of that feat, he had finished the drafting of the naval treaty in four days. Mr. Stimson had previously expressed the hope that it might be done in 10 days, allowing time out for the English Easter.

But it was not merely as a genial host and good story-teller that Senator MORROW had his relations with foreign correspondents. We hear a great deal now about the necessity for sympathy, confidence, and good understanding among the countries. Journalists working abroad naturally feel that they have some legitimate, although unofficial, part to play in producing that understanding. But it can not be done without the help, sympathy, and confidence of the official diplomats; and that was what we always had from Senator MORROW. He did not come into American politics and diplomacy until some years after diplomacy had begun to call itself "open"; and MORROW took the idea of openness very seriously, and enabled the correspondents to render better service to their papers, to the people of the country from which they came, and to the people of the country to which they were accredited.

The CHAIRMAN. That will conclude the meeting. I will wire, with your permission, a message of sympathy to Mrs. Morrow.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted to extend my remarks, I submit the following statement of Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR, of New Jersey:

The passing, on October 5, 1931, of DWIGHT WHITNEY MORROW was an irreparable loss, not only to the State and to the Nation but to the world. At a time when even the wise men grope blindly for the distant ray of sunlight to lead them and their kind from the economic and social morass into the pure light of day, the wide sympathies, the keen intellect, the logical judgments, and the wise counsels of this true American can scarce be spared.

DWIGHT W. MORROW's rise to the heights of leadership over his fellow men is the typical story of the early struggles and hardships of the American youth, who, overcoming innumerable obstacles, continues unswerving on toward the goal. As a youth at Amherst his abilities were quickly recognized, and he was voted by his classmates the student most likely to succeed in later life. His proficiency in mathematics and philosophy during these years of study were to come in good stead when he reached manhood. It affords some additional insight into the character of this man when we hear that the prize money awarded him in a contest in mathematics was spent for railroad tickets so that his father and mother might attend his graduation.

Securing a clerkship in the county offices at Pittsburgh following his graduation, young MORROW saved enough to enter Columbia Law School, where his ability to strip issues of their unessentials was readily recognized.

His rise in the field of law was rapid, and he was successively advanced to positions of high trust, finally becoming a member of J. P. Morgan & Co. The coming of the World War saw him appointed as head of the war-finance campaign, and he assisted in formulating the national thrift campaign plan. President Wilson, disregarding party lines in his quest for high ability, made him a member of the Allied Maritime Transport Council and the Allied Board of Supplies. He sought and achieved the thing that was the pressing demand of the day—results. He achieved it without fanfare and without the beating of drums; but when DWIGHT W. MORROW had finished a job, there were few, if any, improvements that could be made upon it.

The rest of the story is still fresh in the minds of the people—his aid in drafting the first workman's compensation law enacted in New Jersey, his service on the prison inquiry commission and on President Coolidge's air board, his successful efforts to rehabilitate the finances of Cuba, and his culminating triumph of all in the field of statesmanship—the reestablishment of good will between this Nation and Mexico.

Concluding his work in the republic of our southern neighbors, he was sent as a delegate to the London Naval Conference when the call to serve his State in the halls of the United States Senate was sounded. He responded, and the overwhelming plurality given him by the electorate was a tribute to the respect in which the man and his abilities were held by men and women of all parties.

Few men have devoted themselves so unreservedly to the public welfare as did DWIGHT MORROW. In his hands any problem was assured of a safe and sane solution.

His passing leaves the world bereft of a charitable figure, a true gentleman, a talented statesman, and a heart which beat in accord with all of humanity.

THADDEUS H. CARAWAY

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, this day has been set aside as memorial day to honor those of our ranks that have fallen asleep during the year just closed. I desire to speak especially of one of our ranks from the great State of Arkansas, the Hon. T. H. CARAWAY. It was my pleasure to know him intimately for many years, and to know him was to love him. He was a man of positive conviction. You never had any trouble to find where he stood on any of the great questions that confronted the Nation. To say that he has been missed from our ranks does not express it. His influence for good was felt throughout the Nation. He was an able speaker and always held the attention and esteem of his colleagues.

While he devoted the greater part of his time to the practice of law, Senator CARAWAY gave much of his work to the upbuilding of his State, and was ever a prominent figure in the political arena. He possessed untiring energy and was a diligent student. He was one of the most eminent lawyers in Arkansas and was actively engaged in the practice of law.

In his political life he was frank and outspoken. It was his belief that a candidate should stand upon principles, and there was never any difficulty in finding where he stood on public questions. Few men were ever better equipped for the duties of a statesman, none more sincere and honest.

It was but natural that his State should call him to many public offices and finally crown his political life with a commission to the Senate of the United States.

We sympathize with his family that he left behind to mourn his loss. He has gone from us, but will never be forgotten by those of us who loved him. May we emulate his great example of loyalty and profit by his statesmanship.

It is with a feeling of deep personal loss that I say these last few words in memory of my friend, whose nobility of character will ever be an inspiration to the youth of the Nation, whose life is worthy of the highest emulation.

Under the leave granted to extend remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of his colleague, Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, United States Senator from Arkansas:

Service in either branch of the Congress during the last few years has been marked by notably increased duties and responsibilities. The centralization of power and administrative authority in the Federal Government has been rapidly growing during the last 25 years. The process appears to have been quickened since the beginning of the economic depression in October, 1929.

There is hardly a member of the Congress, however familiar he may be with the details pertaining to national legislation, who has not felt the strain incident to the confusion of national policies and the disappointment and dejection incident to the futility of experiments by the lawmaking authorities with schemes designed to restore confidence, revive business, and relieve unemployment.

Many lawmakers, as well as individuals engaged in the various spheres of private enterprise, having failed to safeguard their physical resources, have broken down under the pressure, and more than a few have been called prematurely by death.

The senatorial associates of Senator THADDEUS H. CARAWAY were familiar with his peculiarities of disposition and knew that it was his custom to work almost continuously, seldom indulging in any form of recreation or amusement. Long hours of confinement in his office and in the Senate, with little outdoor exercise, undermined his naturally strong constitution and so reduced his vitality that he was unable to mobilize the vigor and strength essential to recovery from a surgical operation which he found it necessary to undergo during the vacation of Congress in 1931, just at a time when his capacity for usefulness to the public was greater, by reason of his experience and diligence, than at any other period in his prolonged public career.

Distinctive mannerism, occasional sensitiveness, and quick resentment of unjust criticism respecting his position on public issues; exceptional clearness of thought and expression and readiness of witty and humorous retort, gave to Senator CARAWAY a prominent and secure place among the foremost debaters of his time.

Few renowned public men with whom it has been my privilege to be intimately associated have brought to the performance of their duties a broader experience than Senator CARAWAY enjoyed. Trained to hardship and self-reliance in early youth, he acquired while serving as a teacher in the public schools a knowledge of human nature which proved of undoubted value when the obligations and responsibilities of maturity required a measure of self-restraint not always consistent with that impulsive action to which Senator CARAWAY was often prompted by nature.

Before becoming a member of Congress, Mr. CARAWAY served for several years as prosecuting attorney in a district in eastern Arkansas embracing counties comprised in the first congressional district of that State. It is doubtful if the entire country has produced a more effective and successful public prosecutor. The ability to examine and cross-examine witnesses in such a manner as to uncover facts and separate them from conclusions, the power to impress upon courts and juries the significance and relation of material circumstances, are among the indispensable attributes of great advocates. Mr. CARAWAY contributed to the supression of crime by the fearless prosecution of lawbreakers and by demonstrating his ability to secure convictions in all trials when justified by the evidence.

Entering the House of Representatives in 1913, he served with distinction throughout the trying period of the World War and gave hearty support to President Wilson in his measures for the successful conduct of the great conflict. Indeed, he was prompted to contest the reelection to the Senate of Hon. William F. Kirby, who succeeded Senator James P. Clarke (the latter having died a few months before the United States entered the war), on the ground that Senator Kirby had not been sympathetic toward the war policies of President Wilson. The triumphant election of Senator CARAWAY brought him into a new and broader sphere of usefulness where he quickly took a place in the first rank of able and patriotic Senators.

It would be interesting to review his work as a member of the Committee on Agriculture; however, the appropriate limitations on this address hardly permit of the discussion in detail of the measures he proposed. It was one of the bitterest disappointments Senator CARAWAY ever knew when the farm marketing act was passed through the influence of the national administration without the inclusion of either the equalization fee carried in the McNary-Haugen bill or the export-debenture method of agricultural assistance, which he took the initiative in preparing.

As a member of the Judiciary Committee, Senator CARAWAY's training and experience in the practice of the law, his comprehensive grasp of the principles of the Federal Constitution, made him a powerful factor in shaping and controlling the legislative measures which came from that great committee during his service as a member of it.

Extraordinary ability as an investigator, facility for mastering and mobilizing facts, unusual talent in stating and in presenting them, diligence in the performance of duty; severity, even bitterness, in the face of opposition, yet tenderness and sympathy toward all distress and suffering, combined to make for Senator CARAWAY a character and career which has left a lasting influence for good citizenship and wholesome government in the memory of the many thousand friends who mourn his departure.

WILLIAM JULIUS HARRIS

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the wave of grief which swept over the State of Georgia on the evening of April 18, 1932, when news went out from Washington that Senator HARRIS had died, was such a spontaneous and genuinely sincere tribute on the part of the 3,000,000 people whom he had served to the sterling character and accomplishments of the man that the mere addition of words by one individual can add nothing to it. Throughout the news articles which appeared in all of the papers of the State at that time there ran one expression which impressed me deeply, and that was that in his passing the people of Georgia had lost a "friend." Not the accomplishments of his years of public service, many and varied as they were, received emphasis; not the numerous and high honors which had been justly bestowed upon him by his State and Nation; but the fact that in Senator HARRIS every man, woman, and child in Georgia had a "friend"—that was the outstanding feature of private and public comment.

And it was the strength of the man, in his political career. It was not his "the applause of listening senates to command." He made no pretensions to the gift of oratory. He was not showy in his service to his people. But the humblest citizen of Georgia could bring to him his trouble and receive the response of a kindly heart, willing and anxious to give aid wherever it might be rendered. The attainment of distinction, position, and power made him humble and anxious to be worthy, not arrogant nor proud. Too many of our public servants feel that their selection for public place is a selection to rule and not to serve. It was not so with him. WILLIAM J. HARRIS in the Senate was as close to the ordinary man as he was on the streets of his home town before any public honor ever came to him.

Twenty years ago I served with him in the Georgia Legislature. Then, as throughout all of his career, he felt his obligation to the masses of the people, and disclosed that feeling by his legislative work. He was not a demagogue. He did not seek to win the approval of the unthinking by unjust attacks upon the interests of those of his constituents who were wealthy or powerful. He represented them also and gave to them every legitimate assistance in his power. But throughout his long career no man ever suspected that he was subject to the control of any special interest, nor that he viewed his obligation to the humblest farmer or workingman in his State as less sacred than that which he owed other classes of our citizenry.

When I came to Washington as a Member of the Seventieth Congress, with all of the lack of knowledge of practice and procedure in Congress which afflicts every new Member, he found time from his numerous duties to inform, advise, and assist me in every possible way; and he continued the closest cooperation and accord with me in the more than five years that followed until his death. In greater and more poignant degree than those who did not work with him, I mourn the passing of a friend; an able, powerful, honest friend. I know—as who of our people does not—that Georgia never sent out from her red clay hills into her public service a man who loved her more, and never received back into her soil the ashes of a man who was by her people more beloved.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, in the death of its late senior Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS, Georgia has lost a most unusual public servant.

Senator HARRIS devoted himself untiringly to the interests of the people of his State. He was never too busy to attend diligently to any matter in which one of his constituents was interested. No man or woman was too humble to command his best efforts.

For many years he ably represented the State of Georgia in the Senate. He rose, by seniority of service, to the top of the Democratic side of the great Senate Committee on Appropriations. He held other important committee assignments. These arduous duties, however, never caused him to lose sight of the common people of Georgia. Their interests came first with him.

Senator HARRIS was known in our State as one official that always answered a call from his people. He served them with diligence and devotion and was always active in every matter that concerned the welfare of the State.

His death is a great loss to our people. He is mourned by a host of devoted friends and my sympathy rests with them and with the members of his family. He was a true friend, devoted and loyal to those legions of Georgians by whom he was honored with three elections to the United States Senate.

He was always kind and helpful to me, always ready and glad to assist in any matter concerning my district. His death is a great loss to me personally and to our State.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the State of Georgia lost a true friend and the Nation suffered an irreparable loss in the death of Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS on April 18 of this year.

He and I came to the Congress at the same time, both taking the oath of office on May 19, 1919, during the last two years of the administration of President Woodrow Wilson. We both had been elected at the November election, the same month in which the World War came to a close. We not only assumed duties new to us, but new to all Members of the House and Senate.

The World War has more than doubled the departmental work of Members of Congress. We all gladly render this labor of love to those who served so nobly and well in the hour of our great peril.

No one was more anxious to serve well the veterans of all wars than Senator HARRIS. Especial attention was given by him to the claims of the veterans who suffered service-connected disabilities.

Senator HARRIS, because of his previous experience in departmental matters, was well fitted for the splendid and untiring service which he rendered not only to World War veterans but to all who asked him for aid.

Senator HARRIS knew to the fullest extent the importance of details and the value of little things. He knew that the least things make the greatest; that invisible atoms make the universe and seconds of time make eternity. He did nobly and well the great acts of human endeavor by performing with painstaking care the minor parts.

His careful attention to detail, his honesty of purpose, and his great loyalty to his people enabled him to become a true an honorable servant of the people he loved so well.

His every act showed that he knew that "duty is the sublimest word in the English language."

With him a promise was most sacred and never to be broken. I have never known a man in public life who could stand more pressure without shadow of turning from a friend whom he had promised to serve.

Senator HARRIS was a valuable public official and his friends everywhere suffered a great loss in his passing. He filled his place in the United States Senate ably, and no one else can render the quiet, unassuming, efficient, all-embracing service so peculiarly his own.

He understood to the fullest extent that the greatest powers in the universe are most silent.

Like the silence of gravitation, the stillness of the sunshine, and the quietness of a mother's love, he did and did well his life's work, and like all of these it will last through all eternity.

Mr. Speaker, during the first 12 years of my service here only two of my colleagues passed into the Great Beyond.

First, I went to Georgia with all that was mortal of the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, and saw him returned to Mother Earth at Thomson, Ga. Several years later I left in Washington in apparently good health my good friend Hon. Leslie J. Steele, of the fifth Georgia district, only a few days later to be notified of his passing and to attend his funeral at Decatur, Ga., where I saw him for the last time until the great awakening.

Now, during the last 12 months, I have been notified of the death and attended the funeral of three of my beloved colleagues:

First, Hon. Charles Gordon Edwards, of the first congressional district, who was buried in Savannah; next, Hon. Samuel Rutherford, who was buried in Forsyth; and last, Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS, who was buried recently in Cedartown.

When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions.

Three nobler, truer friends of mankind never lived. Their work is imperishable. It will last as long as yonder sun shall shine.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS was one of the most unique characters who ever occupied a seat in the United States Senate. The one dominant, outstanding trait in his sterling character was his uncompromising loyalty to conviction. In truth, this was the very genesis of his political creed. He possessed an agility and vivacity of spirit that seemed to increase rather than diminish as the years passed. Although in ill health for some time before his death, the close of his life was marked by the same interest in and application to his official duties that had characterized the commencement of his public service.

Beginning his public career he was, first, secretary to the late Senator Clay, of Georgia, after whose death he returned to Georgia, engaged in business, and was elected to the State senate, where he served with much credit. He was manager of the 1912 Woodrow Wilson presidential campaign in Georgia. Upon Mr. Wilson's entry into office he first designated Mr. HARRIS as Director of the Census and later as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, of which body he became the chairman. His services in these positions were so satisfactory and he was so greatly admired by Mr. Wilson that in 1918 he personally advocated his election to the United States Senate. He was successful in that notable campaign and thereafter served continuously in the Senate until death.

Elbert Hubbard said that after perusing the lives of great men one concluded that it was more difficult to find a gentleman than a genius. I do not agree with Mr. Hubbard. I have met many gentlemen who would be properly classed among the great—I have found them in all walks of life, rich and poor, proud and humble, wise and not so wise—men who consistently displayed all the fine attributes of character and conduct that constitute a gentleman. Senator HARRIS is entitled to be classed among the great. He was a gentleman at all times and under all circumstances. He possessed to a marked degree the spirit of forgiveness toward those who he thought had wronged him and was ever ready and willing to adjust differences on equal and honorable grounds. This is characteristic of greatness and goodness. His demise marked a broad, dark somber swath across the political horizon of Georgia. His death is a loss, both personal and public, to which it is difficult to properly reconcile any thoughts and feelings.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it has been said some men are born great and others achieve greatness, but the latter was essentially true of the late Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS.

By intelligent application and unceasing energy he acquired a broad knowledge of the true principles upon which our great Government was founded, and applied these principles in his private and official conduct.

Born of distinguished parentage, he was reared in a country town, and the foundation for his subsequent active and useful life was based on a practical education secured in the common schools, followed by a course in the University of Georgia.

As a young man he became the private secretary to the late Senator A. S. Clay, and during this service he acquired a liberal knowledge of the workings of the United States Senate and of governmental affairs.

He was later elected to the State Senate of Georgia, where he rendered active and constructive service. Later he was appointed Director of the United States Census Bureau, in which position he made a splendid and notable record. Then he became Acting Secretary of the Department of Commerce, in which position his services were most creditable and efficient. He later served as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and administered the affairs of this responsible position with a high order of efficiency and with great value to the people of the United States.

In 1918 he was elected to the United States Senate from Georgia for the term beginning March 4, 1919, and was reelected in 1925 and again in 1930, in which last election he received the largest majority ever received by any candidate for the United States Senate from Georgia; his opponent carrying only 1 of the 161 counties of the State.

It was during his service in the Senate that he rendered his most constructive and useful service, where he had the confidence, esteem, and respect of his fellow Senators on each side of the aisle. He enjoyed an intimate acquaintance with the late President Wilson, and commanded his confidence and personal friendship.

He at all times championed the cause of the masses, and his great heart literally pulsated in their interest.

He was perhaps the most attentive to the wants of his people and the most indefatigable and untiring worker ever in the Senate from Georgia, and there was nothing either great or small which concerned his great constituency to which he was not always ready to give his personal and intelligent attention.

In his passing, the State and the entire country suffered the loss of a patriotic citizen and an intelligent and loyal public servant.

Mr. MOBLEY. Mr. Speaker, during the Seventy-second Congress the ranks of the Georgia delegation have been thinned by death as have those of no other State in the Union.

The first district of Georgia in July of 1931 lost its popular and useful Representative Hon. Charles G. Edwards.

On February 4, 1932, Hon. Samuel Rutherford, who represented the sixth district, was suddenly snatched away.

Then, on April 18, 1932, the beloved senior Senator from Georgia, Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS, was called by death.

While Senator HARRIS was in attendance at the funeral of Mr. Rutherford, I was with him for the last time. He was not feeling well at that time, but friend that he was to all the people of our great State and the pleasure he received from being among them prompted a visit from him to the business people of Forsyth while there on that occasion. In accompanying him on his visit among our people, I was made to realize more than ever before why he was so greatly beloved by the people of Georgia.

He had the wonderful faculty of remembering people and names as probably no man in public life in Georgia has ever had. He had not only remembered the people themselves, but if he had ever had personal or political association with them these facts were not forgotten. He had a personal interest in every person he represented and there has never been a man in public life in our State who was called upon for service as was Senator HARRIS.

Men in all walks of life alike considered him their friend, and friend he was. The promptness and thoroughness with which he handled matters met with the approval of his constituents and prompted them to make heavy demands upon him, to which he always cheerfully responded.

Senator HARRIS was not considered a great orator. He made no pretense in that direction. However, he was one of the most useful Members of the United States Senate. He was ever alert and awake to the problems of our State and Nation. He sponsored much corrective legislation while in the Senate and was unusually successful in his undertakings.

If he had one worthy and commendable trait that stood out and outshone his many others, it was his courage of conviction and sincerity of purpose.

Our State will probably never be represented by as useful a public servant and as honest and conscientious a man as was Senator HARRIS.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a memorial address by Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE, as follows:

It was my pleasure and privilege to serve in the United States Senate with the late Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS from the latter part of 1922 until his untimely death on April 18, a period of nearly 10 years. I feel that I am in a position to judge of his great worth and usefulness to the Nation, the State, and to the individual citizen of Georgia. He was untiring, and his efforts were constructive and fruitful.

It is fitting that the people of Georgia should recall the long public service of Senator HARRIS, which extended over a period of 20 years, practically without interruption. He entered the Georgia State Senate in 1911, completing his term there and accepting the position of secretary to United States Senator A. S. Clay. He served as a member of the State Democratic committee. His next important post was that of Director of the Bureau of the Census from 1913 to 1915. He also served a short time as Acting Secretary of the Department of Commerce. Under President Wilson he was chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, resigning to make the race for United States Senator in 1918, to which office he was elected and which he held until his death.

In the Senate he was keenly alive to the needs of his people and was instrumental in securing the passage of important legislation and the setting aside of many necessary appropriations to carry on worth-while Federal activities in Georgia. Among the many important accomplishments may be enumerated appropriations to determine the cause and cure of cancer, the use of southern pine for the manufacture of paper, and the eradication of fruit and animal diseases. He was also interested in the purchasing of Georgia lands to be used as national parks. At the time his services were terminated he was earnestly attempting to limit the immigration of Mexican labor in an effort to aid our cotton farmers. He was twice successful in securing the passage of a bill for this purpose by the Senate.

Senator HARRIS was a member of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, Commerce, Immigration, Military Affairs, and Territories and Insular Affairs. The first three named received most of his attention. Many monuments will remain in Georgia testifying to his activities and the success of his work in the Committees on Appropriations and Commerce.

As secretary to Senator Clay, Mr. HARRIS became familiar with the needs and desires of fellow Georgians. His experience gained there was invaluable to him in filling the position to which he was subsequently promoted and which he so adequately filled. The characteristic which endeared him to the people of our State, however, was his interest in, his love for, and his desire to assist and serve the individual, whatever his position in life. That he carried this feeling with him to the end is the greatest tribute that can be paid him.

While the loss to the Nation and State is great, it is the man in the street and on the farm who will more keenly feel his loss and regret his passing.

Georgia and Georgians may regard with pride the achievements of Senator HARRIS. On my last visit to his bedside, he spoke of humble Georgia citizens who had called upon the Senators and seemed pleased and happy when I reported the satisfactory service rendered certain of them. He died praying to get back to work.

HENRY ALLEN COOPER

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, I feel that it is a great honor to be able to pay a word of tribute to my distinguished predecessor from the first district of Wisconsin, the Hon. HENRY ALLEN COOPER, who served with honor and distinction in this body for many years before I was born. His term of service here was continuous except for the two years of 1919–1921, when he was defeated as a result of his courageous stand against the entry of the United States into the World War.

In the lives of many men there is some one incident which brings out in bold relief the character of the man and the things for which he stood. I feel that this was true of HENRY ALLEN COOPER, and that it was my great privilege to have been present when this event occurred. It was at the Republican National Convention at Cleveland in 1924, when on the third day of the convention Mr. COOPER was called upon to present to the convention the minority platform of the Wisconsin Progressive delegation.

The audience was obviously tired and in no receptive mood for a platform of the kind proposed by the Wisconsin delegation. When Mr. COOPER was introduced by the permanent chairman, Mr. Frank W. Mondell, of Wyoming, there was a tremendous hostile uproar throughout the convention hall. There were cries throughout the great audience of "bolshevist," "go to Russia," "throw him out," boos and catcalls, while in the corridors of the building the convention attachés were singing an improvised convention anthem, "To hell with La Follette," sung to the tune of the Old Oaken Bucket.

The newspaper photographers immediately sensed that this was the one dramatic incident in a convention that had been as devoid of excitement as a college commencement. The powerful klieg lights were turned on Mr. COOPER. The hostile demonstrations continued. Mr. COOPER waited in courtly silence. It was a contest in crowd psychology. Somehow the spectacle of the tall, slender, immaculately dressed, white-bearded gentleman on the platform had its effect upon that hostile crowd. Somehow he seemed out of place. He did not look like any of the politicians who had been milling about on that platform for the past three days. His appearance suggested rather that of one of the prophets of old, who, by some strange disarrangement in time and place, had gotten into that political arena. The hostile audience became impressed with this strange spectacle. After 5 or 10 minutes the hostile demonstration began to subside. Mr. COOPER waited till there was complete and expectant silence and began his address.

He told them that as a young man he had read the proceedings of another convention held at Cleveland where a certain distinguished American had defended the right of a minority to be heard. That it had made a lasting impression in his mind and that that afternoon he had gone to the Cleveland Public Library and found the quotation:

> The main object of an old party becomes more and more the retention or the regaining of power. The great curse of our present politics is that your heated partisan never knows the other side. It seems to him that it is disloyal to be on the other side. The element now so sadly needed in our politics is consideration of every question on its individual merits and willingness always to hear the other side.
> No person can do a higher duty than to resist the majority when he believes it wrong; to assist the right of individual judgment and maintain it; to cherish liberty of thought and action against the tyranny of his own or any other party.

There was a small amount of applause coming from the Wisconsin and North Dakota delegations. Mr. COOPER continued:

> The man whose words I quoted was at one time editor of the New York Tribune, and he represented us at the Court of St. James as United States ambassador—Whitelaw Reid. I have noticed a good deal of applause from the Wisconsin delegation, but I do not hear much from New York, although several of Mr. Reid's relatives are in that delegation.

Obviously, this patriarchal figure was more than able to hold his own in any fencing contest of wits. The crowd was definitely beginning to warm up. Mr. COOPER continued:

> It is no new thing for the Wisconsin delegation to be charged with bolshevism, and similar charges. In fact we are getting used to it. We have been coming here to these Republican conventions with minority platforms ever since 1908. It devolved upon me then to present that minority platform.
> At that time we were met by calls from the audience of "socialism," "take it to Denver," and still every one of these planks which were so booed and hissed in 1908, with the sole exception of one, is now the law of the land.

Mr. COOPER proceeded to enumerate the direct election of United States Senators and other measures that had been booed and hissed in 1908, but had since been enacted into law by one or the other of the two major political parties.

In conclusion he added:

> Since that convention in 1908 Wisconsin has presented several minority platforms, and in them were 31 planks, 26 of which are now the law of the land, and one of those planks, as I have stated, is in the Constitution of the United States.

By this time the unfriendly audience listened in silence. There was something prophetic about this tall, white-bearded man, telling them of the progress that had been forced upon a reluctant majority by a small minority possessed of courage, foresight, and determination. Mr. COOPER began to read from the minority platform:

> The present condition of American agriculture constitutes an emergency of the gravest character. The Department of Commerce report shows that during 1923 there was a steady and marked increase in dividends paid by the great industrial corporations. * * * On the other hand, the Secretary of Agriculture reports that in the 15 principal wheat-growing States more than 108,000 farmers since 1920 have lost their farms through forelosure or bankruptcy; that more than 122,000 have surrendered their property without legal proceedings, and that nearly 375,000 have retained possession of their properly only through the leniency of their creditors, making a total of more than 600,000, or 26 per cent, of all farmers who have virtually been bankrupted since 1920 in these 15 States alone. * * *
> We pledge a complete house cleaning in the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, and the other executive departments * * *.
>
> We pledge recovery of the Navy's oil reserves and all other parts of the public domain which have been fraudulently or illegally leased or otherwise wrongfully transferred to the control of private interests * * *.
>
> We favor public ownership of the Nation's water power and the creation and development of a national superwater power system and strict public control and permanent conservation of all the Nation's resources, including coal, iron, and other ores, oil, and timber lands, in the interest of the people * * *.
>
> We denounce the Mellon tax plan as a device to relieve multimillionaires at the expense of other taxpayers * * *.
>
> We favor taxes upon excess profits to penalize profiteering, and complete publicity under proper safeguards of all Federal tax returns * * *.
>
> We favor the election of Federal judges by direct vote of the people * * *.
>
> We favor drastic reduction of the exorbitant duties on manufactures provided in the Fordney-McCumber tariff legislation; the prohibiting of gambling by speculators and profiteers in agricultural products; the reconstruction of the Federal reserve and Federal farm-loan systems so as to eliminate control by usurers, speculators, and international financiers, and to make the credit of the Nation available upon fair terms to all and without discrimination to business men, farmers, and home builders * * *.
>
> We favor abolition of the use of injunctions in labor disputes * * *.
>
> We favor adjusted compensation for the veterans of the late war, not as charity but as a matter of right, and we demand that the money necessary to meet this obligation of the Government be raised by taxes laid upon wealth in proportion to the ability to pay, and declare our opposition to the sales tax or any other device to shift this obligation onto the backs of the poor in higher prices and increased cost of living.
>
> We favor a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea, thus making the primary markets on the Great Lakes equal to those of New York * * *.
>
> We favor such amendments to the Federal Constitution as may be necessary to provide for the direct nomination and election of the President, to extend the initiative and referendum to the Federal Government, and to insure a popular referendum for or against war except in cases of actual invasion.
> We denounce the mercenary system of degraded foreign policy under recent administrations in the interests of financial imperialists, oil monopolists, and international bankers, which has at times degraded our State Department from its high service as a strong and kindly intermediary of defenseless governments to a trading outpost for those interests and concession seekers engaged in the exploitation of weaker nations, as contrary to the will of the American people, destructive of domestic development, and provocative of war. * * *

As Mr. COOPER concluded his remarks, the regular routine of the convention went on. The majority platform was overwhelmingly adopted. The President was renominated and the convention adjourned.

But in the memory of every person who attended that convention, a lasting impression was carried away. It was a picture of a finely featured, tall and erect, white-bearded man, 74 years of age, who had dared to stand against the almost unanimous opposition of that convention and had left the individuals within that convention hall with a feeling of "almost thou persuadest me, Paul"; a man who, despite the fact that he had been during most of his public life a voice of protest against the policies of the majority, had nevertheless been the means of forcing that majority to enact into law many of the measures that he had sponsored. A man who, despite the weight of three quarters of a century, was still looking into the future with prophetic clarity of vision and seeking to force upon a reluctant majority those measures of reform which he believed essential to the preservation and well-being of the Republic.

It was six years later that Mr. COOPER told me that even then he was receiving mail from people in various parts of the United States, whom he had never met, but who desired to recount the incidents of that evening and to again live over with him that brief moment of color and drama at the Republican National Convention of 1924 when he had stood as a prophet of the future espousing the cause of the underprivileged many whom he had loved so well and served so long.

The people who were privileged to hear Mr. COOPER on that occasion carried away with them a picture of him that his constituents in the first district of Wisconsin had formed through half a century of contact with this ideal public servant.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when death claimed HENRY ALLEN COOPER from our midst his fellow Members of the House of Representatives realized deeply that they had lost a truly conscientious patriot, a scholarly gentleman, a valuable friend, and a good man.

To pay tribute to men who have passed to the great hereafter is easy; but to be the recipient while living of such appreciation and high commendation as was consistently accorded to Congressman COOPER is a rare privilege. Time after time his constituency showed their estimation of his worth by reelecting him as their Representative to Congress—18 terms in all, 36 years. To his colleagues he was one of the most beloved men that ever sat in the House of Representatives.

Mr. COOPER's popularity did not bespeak a passive acquiescence nor an easy docility. On the other hand, his usual rôle was that of active allegiance to a small minority in some cause that he felt to be right. Even before he came to Congress, while serving in the Wisconsin Legislature, he fathered the Australian ballot in that State. He sponsored this system of the secret ballot as a means of doing away with the evil of purchasing and controlling votes.

Soon after his coming to the House of Representatives he was appointed to the Pacific Railways Committee. A bill for the refunding of the debts of the Pacific railroads to the Government was up for consideration. Convinced of the corruption and greed on the part of a certain handful of directors of these western roads, he led an extended fight in the interest of the Government and of the common people. He exposed in speeches before the House thefts of hundreds of millions of dollars by these directors in voting themselves the actual bona fide stock and paying construction companies and those who worked with pick and shovel only watered stocks based on fraudulent and fictitious capitalization. Mr. COOPER, despite his being a young Member, had the courage to say that these directors "acted in flagrant violation of the rights of the Government" and of its laws. He dared to stand by his own measure of what his honor considered right, even to refusing for himself and three colleagues a bribe of $100,000 if he would withdraw from the battle.

Mr. COOPER was active in the fight in the House to break down the autocratic power known as Cannonism. Into this, as into all other issues, he entered fearlessly, but with such grace and good judgment that, though he differed with the political sentiment of his own district, which was largely conservative, and with the views of many of those with whom he labored in Congress, he convinced all thoroughly as to his sincerity of purpose to follow right as his own conscience revealed it to him. Personal advancement or party loyalty did not loom as large in his view as human rights. Probably the most dramatic episode in his career was when he went before the Republican convention, in 1924, to plead for the adoption of the La Follette platform of progressive principles. There were hisses and jeers. But after Mr. COOPER had spoken but a few minutes the hall rang with cheers.

We are all familiar with the gentle dignity, the high ideals, the commanding personality, the delightful goodfellowship of our late dean of the House, Mr. COOPER. He served continuously in Congress from 1893 to 1931, with but one lapse, 1918–1920. The cause for his defeat for this one session was that he fearlessly voted against the war. His political enemies circulated false and misleading statements impugning his loyalty. The Clerk of the House, William Tyler Page, whose length of service in that body, in various capacities, had far outdistanced Mr. COOPER's, presented the splendid record of achievement Mr. COOPER had made, commended his outstanding faithfulness in attendance on the sessions of the House, and completely annihilated this circular of misrepresentation and malice. Of him he said:

> Every act and vote since our country went to war has been as patriotic as that of the President himself.

When, in presenting the progressive platform to the 1924 Republican convention, he advocated a referendum in the case of war, that great audience cheered him vigorously. Representative COOPER was a lover of peace. Early in his career he denounced "war's glorious but bloody and cruel triumphs."

He was the first chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs. President McKinley asked Speaker Henderson to appoint Mr. COOPER to this position, giving as his reason that he wanted "no exploiting of those islands." The Filipino people never had a more loyal defender in America. He was largely responsible for the passage of the first organic act of July 1, 1902. The day before the debate in the House on the bill to permit the people of the Philippines to elect their lower house of the Philippine Legislature he came across the Philippine martyr-statesman Rizal's poem "Farewell." There had been much opposition to the bill and only three of the committee supported Mr. COOPER. When he read the poem to the House in his own masterful way there were a few minutes of silence and then the House broke out in an uproar of applause and rose to honor him. The bill passed. To-day there is a bridge in the Philippines that bears his name, but his memory, says a Resident Commissioner from the Philippines, "will live forever in the hearts and minds of every Filipino of this and future generations." Flags hung at halfstaff in the Philippines when this loyal friend of freedom had fallen asleep, to rise and champion their cause no more.

I was glad to tell my friend HAL COOPER how he elected me to Congress. Comparing Mr. COOPER's record with that of my opponent, I saw where he had voted right and my opponent had not. It was easy to see that Mr. COOPER was a safe guide to follow. This gave me my issues on which I stood in the campaign, and much of my direction since. During our long and delightful service together in the House I often found that his was good and wise counsel. In the pressure of business or on questions difficult to decide I would say, "Hal, how are you voting?" I never found that he gave me wrong advice. He was guided by high moral principles, always to be depended upon. He studied carefully every angle of legislation, and then voted in the interest of the greatest good, irrespective of who or what party supported it.

Mr. COOPER loved the finer things of life. He was a musician, a composer, a classic scholar, and an orator. His memory was unique. Facts stored away in his mind remained there. He could with great ease quote dates, references, long passages of poetry or prose. When Mr. COOPER spoke, people were eager to listen. In the House shortly before his death he sponsored a bill relative to the designation of one of the streets of Washington, D. C., as Constitution Avenue. Following his impressive address in support of this bill the Members rose in enthusiastic tribute to his marked eloquence.

This avenue connecting Arlington with the United States Capitol is itself symbolic of Mr. COOPER's life. His patriotism was ever in closest harmony with his sense of duty. It was an unbroken chain of high ideals and faithful service.

Then "God's finger touched him," and now he, too, sleeps.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, the close of the life of HENRY ALLEN COOPER must have been just as he himself would have ordered it. His work for the Seventy-first Congress was finished, and the Seventy-second Congress, to which he had been reelected, was nine months in the future. The honors of his State and district were fresh upon him, and all of his years were a shining record of achievement for the cause of humanity. Surely, there could be no more appropriate time to lay down the burdens of a busy life!

Thirty-four years had he served in the House of Representatives, and was the dean of that body at his passing. No man in recent times had a finer record nor enjoyed the friendship and respect of his fellows to a greater extent than he, and few there were who possessed in so marked a degree all of the physical habiliments of a statesman. Tall and handsome, with leonine expression, he fulfilled every concept of the "noblest Roman of them all."

My associations with Mr. COOPER were during the last 10 years of his life, although I had read a great deal of his activities prior to that. It was inspiring to see the righteous anger flashing in his eyes when he would learn of some new act of oppression by those seeking special-interest legislation. His life was devoted to the relief of the weak and against the encroachments of the strong. He was ever the ready champion of the poor man and the toiler, and never ceased to do battle for the great principles of liberty and equality on which our Government is founded. If there ever was a valiant defender of the Constitution of the United States, based on a sincere love and understanding of its principles, such a defender was HENRY ALLEN COOPER. His every legislative act was in furtherance of the principles of that great governmental document.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, HENRY ALLEN COOPER was a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives in the full meaning of that term for more than a third of a century. The span of an average lifetime found him here during every session, as punctual in attendance as the Speaker of the House, as active and useful in his service as any Member of this great parliamentary body.

This was his legislative home. Little escaped him during the long life spent within these walls that saw many Speakers come and go during years that covered the rapid development of a great nation, the history of two American wars, and witnessed every phase of legislative enactments during his long, useful, and highly honored career.

True to himself, faithful to the highest ideals of government, intensely patriotic, scorning deception or its appearance, our loved colleague measured up to the full stature of high statesmanship.

Crisp, Reed, Henderson, Cannon, and Champ Clark were among the eminent men who occupied the Speaker's chair during that period, and the last Speaker who followed him closely to his eternal rest, Longworth, with the others, was among COOPER's loved friends and associates.

Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, Taft, all came on the scene as national leaders during COOPER's earlier legislative service, and it is disclosing no confidence when saying that these Presidents, and others in later years, consulted with him on matters of national importance. Able men in their high offices, so, too, was COOPER in the legislative arena.

From his successful law practice this well-equipped, highly cultured, gifted statesman stepped to the senate of his native State, where he had placed the Australian ballot and other notable legislative acts to his credit, and then came to this House of Representatives, which he deemed the greatest parliamentary body in the world.

Here he was long to remain the center of the arena, surrounded by a coterie of friends, friends who knew him and loved him for his strong character, splendid personality, and rare quality of humor for which he was justly famous. Others may speak of his well-known legal and legislative abilities, of his high ideals, integrity, and strength of purpose that marked a long and useful public career, but he possessed also a marvelous sense of humor and quick grasp of proportions that often brought order out of bitter disagreements by a sudden quip or clever illustration which rarely failed to relieve the tension. That phase of his mental equipment disarmed opponents and helped arrive at mutual settlements of personal and legislative controversies.

His was a charming personality; a musician and modest composer, a student of history, of men, and above all of nature, who loved the trees, flowers, and living things; a delightful companion, sought by all who were benefited by his friendship.

Whether the center of a small circle of colleagues or in the heat of legislative debate or speaking to thousands of critical auditors at national political conventions, COOPER was ever master of the situation. This was equally true when leading hosts to victory or championing the cause of a small group, like himself sincere advocates of a cause. Numbers or surroundings were equally unimportant to the man who had a message and never failed to voice it effectively and convincingly.

Powerful in advocacy of any cause he espoused, he scorned hypocrisy and cant, striking squarely; but by respecting his opponents' rights he was equally admired in debate by friend or foe. These outstanding qualities, so desired by the average legislator, were possessed by COOPER to a marked degree.

His field of work and wealth of human sympathy led him frequently to speak for the rights of the oppressed, irrespective of creed, condition, or color. The struggling Filipino, who had been wrested from Spanish control by the guns of Dewey's fleet, was always near his heart. President McKinley's high estimate of our colleague was evidenced by his selection of Representative COOPER as chairman of the first Philippine Committee, of which Henderson, Joe Cannon, and other able chairmen of committees, then in the House, were members. That committee made a survey of the Filipino people and their needs, and after a study of conditions in the Philippines laid down a legislative program which gave these people a large part in their own government, fitting them for the independence so dearly coveted by the people of every land.

Others may recount the many struggles and victories won in debate and legislative accomplishments of our colleague, but I seek only to give a brief pen picture of a personal friend, of a truly lovable man, great in political prosperity or adversity, or indomitable courage and fine personal character. For nearly a score of years I was associated with his work and remained near him during the closing of an eventful life, even to the day when, as the highly honored dean of the House, he passed away, in legislative harness to the last, as he would have had it.

His loved wife and helpmate was his constant companion, always at his side, giving advice and encouragement to her brilliant, distinguished husband.

On the day of his death, apparently in good health, with a well-rounded fourscore of years to his credit, I sat with him during a session of the House and again congratulated him on the successful effort to make Constitution Avenue a lasting and beautiful monument to his memory. That and many other acts in the beautification of Washington came from his understanding of its needs, due in part to membership on a congressional committee appointed in 1920 by Speaker Clark. A lover of fine arts, of Washington's rapidly developing power and beauty among the great capitals of the world, appreciating its possibilities of attractiveness through nature's gifts and the Government's pride of ownership, COOPER was always at his best when picturing the limitless possibilities of the Nation's Capital, of which he seemed a part.

That same evening I was called to his deathbed. Eulogies have been and will be pronounced that stir the hearts of men, and many were uttered here and at the service held in his Wisconsin home, but the highest honor accorded our distinguished colleague was when his little home city was crowded with friends, who stood for miles with uncovered heads, testifying by their mute presence that they, like ourselves, had lost a trusted adviser and loved friend.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, more than 50 years ago there appeared on the scenes of Wisconsin politics a new figure—HENRY ALLEN COOPER—a young lawyer then a candidate for district attorney of Racine County. His successful campaign and election marked the beginning of a career dedicated to public service which stands out in the history of American public life. Possessed of a keen intellect, a rugged honesty, and a passionate sympathy for the oppressed and downtrodden, this young lawyer soon developed a reputation that six years later won for him the nomination and election to the State senate.

There he framed and secured the enactment of the secret ballot law of Wisconsin. For 40 years it has remained the keystone of the election machinery in the State, and the fact that many other Commonwealths have copied it constitutes the highest compliment to the statesmanship of its author and sponsor. Mr. COOPER served through the administration of Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and for two years in the Hoover administration; always representing the liberal view and devoting his untiring energies and great abilities to carry on the struggle for those less fortunate.

Mr. COOPER was made chairman of the new Committee on Insular Affairs after the United States had acquired the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, at the direct request of President Roosevelt. He selected Mr. COOPER in preference to Members who had seen many more years of service and who had greater claims to this high honor, because he knew HENRY ALLEN COOPER would devote all his energies to safeguard and promote the welfare of the peoples of these islands. From that time forward he never ceased his efforts to break down the chains of oppression binding these people.

During the era of the Great War, when hysteria and intolerance swept the land, searing the love man bore for his neighbor, threatening to engulf all those who had the temerity to oppose the awful carnage then sweeping Europe, HENRY ALLEN COOPER braved the storms and stood on the floor of the House, raising his voice in opposition and warning:

> I am not an anarchist and I do not believe in the abolition of organized government, but if there ever was a time in the history of the human race when men ought to possess common sense and the power to discriminate and reason, it is now in the Republic of the United States.

On the eve of the declaration of war he rose on the floor of the House, and, in a voice shaking with emotion, he uttered these prophetic words:

> Gentlemen, if we pretend to statesmanship we must try to see all sides of great questions. The destruction of England would be a great calamity, and the world ought never to permit it. So, too, the dismemberment of Germany would be a world calamity, and the world ought never to permit that. I pray that the neutral nations may in combination find some way speedily to bring this horror to an end.

Possessing deep convictions that the highest statesmanship required the exercise of the right to express his views, and to vote his deliberate judgment on economic issues before Congress, he bitterly assailed the boss-ridden and caucus-ruled party régime exemplified by Speaker Cannon. He said:

> I was bred in a school of politics which taught that any man anywhere in this Republic had a right to his honest opinion and a right to be heard when he wished to express it.

And again:

> I deny here and now that any number of men, say 51 out of 100 at a caucus, two more than a majority or any other caucus majority, have the authority under any circumstances to control my vote against my well-considered honest judgment.

Because he helped break the rules under which the membership of the House was denied the right to exercise its free will, he was removed as chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee, a position which he held at the instance of the titular head of his party, the President of the United States.

With Mr. COOPER it was never a question of, "Is this approved by the leaders? Is it in the party platform? What has the caucus done about it?" but rather, "Is this measure in the interests of the people of my country?"

The death of Mr. COOPER ended a career worthy of emulation. His life and work run like a golden thread through the history of his country. I commend it to the Nation.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, the Grim Reaper has visited these halls again, this time to carry away with him the life of one who was loved by all of us, and one who was particularly dear to his colleagues from Wisconsin.

HENRY ALLEN COOPER served his district for 36 years. We have all bowed to him as the dean of this assemblage. I am sure his memory will live with us forever as that of an honest, upright, and strong character.

Mr. COOPER had been in public life since a very early age and had won the increasing admiration of all who were associated with him over the years. Nothing we can say here will add to the greatness of his life. We can but acknowledge it and determine to fit some of the traits of this shining character into our own.

He regarded his fight against the railroads early in his congressional experience as the outstanding event of his career in the House of Representatives. In the face of bribes, threats, and trickery, he stood immovable in defense of the public interest, and it is generally accepted that but for the position he took on the floor of the House at that time another great public-land steal would have been accomplished.

Another high light of his career was the appointment given him by President McKinley to study conditions in the Philippines shortly after they came into our possession. Mr. COOPER was largely instrumental in establishing the system of self-government which was worked out for the Philippines and which has met the needs of those islands admirably since adoption. The gratitude of the Filipinos for this service and his interest in their problems was expressed by the delegate from the Philippines on the day of his death.

Politically Mr. COOPER was a sound progressive. He was never afraid to oppose the interests who sought to perpetuate the established order to their own advantage and the disadvantage of the public. It may be said of him that he was never to be enticed from the path of service and strictest honesty in the performance of that service.

Mr. COOPER was a man of strong sympathy, brilliant intellect, and possessed of an astounding memory. His ability to absorb details and retain them was truly nothing short of amazing, and this characteristic was present even to the end. It is indeed seldom that we find a man of Mr. COOPER'S age who can picture the events of his childhood and early manhood with the vividness with which he recalled them. He committed literature to memory with the greatest ease. An enthusiast for Shakespeare, he was able to recite extensively from those plays. This served to embellish his writings and his speeches, and many of them are literary masterpieces. The last speech he made in this Chamber sent the thrill of patriotism surging through the veins of everyone who heard it. It was a simple appeal to change the name of B Street in Washington to Constitution Avenue, but he used the occasion as a vehicle for an address as stirring as any I have heard on this floor.

Mr. COOPER was an intense lover of the beautiful. In fact, it may be said his was a tremendous affection for everything fine and beautiful. This expressed itself in an appreciation of all the fine arts. He was a great lover of nature and a composer of music.

One of Mr. COOPER'S great interests was the development of the National Capital. But for his interest in this city we might not have the Lincoln Memorial. His insistence upon the erection of an appropriate monument instead of the construction of a highway from Washington to Gettysburg resulted in the erection of the impressive memorial we are all so very proud of to-day.

For intellectual ability few were his peers, and as to integrity none were. With his great appreciation for the fine things in life went a large understanding of and sympathy for the masses of the people. Truly, HENRY ALLEN COOPER has built a place for himself among the great.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time deeply impressed with a sense of recollection of my long association here in the House of Representatives with the late HENRY ALLEN COOPER, of the first district of Wisconsin, and it is with pride and pleasure that I pay my tribute on this occasion to his memory.

Mr. COOPER represented the first congressional district of Wisconsin, which includes Rock County, where I spent some of the happy days of my early life, and his being elected to the Fifty-third and each succeeding Congress up to the Seventy-first, with exception of the Sixty-sixth, is evidence of a convincing nature of the remarkable regard in which he was held. During his long service in the House it was my pleasure and honor to come in close and frequent friendly contact with him, and, as the years rolled on, I came to realize why his constituents honored him by repeatedly electing him to office, and why he was held in such high esteem by his many friends, and why it may be truly said that his public service was a notable contribution to the welfare of his State and country.

Mr. COOPER had and displayed those sterling qualities which we love to see, his genial disposition, keen intellect, noble character, and experience in legislative work, coupled with his patriotic, active, and effective public service, his unswerving and unusual devotion to truth, to the best interest of his State and Nation, always evident in his performance of public duty, naturally won him distinction and many friends.

In closing, may I say, "Truly the world was better for his having been in it."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I believe it was the great bard who said, "When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions."

The last year has witnessed the passing of an unusually large number of able, distinguished Members of the House of Representatives. Among those who passed on was the late HENRY ALLEN COOPER, who for many years represented, with a high order of ability and distinction, the first congressional district of Wisconsin.

HENRY ALLEN COOPER was a Member of the House of Representatives when I came to this Chamber. Gracious, friendly, interested particularly in those who were entering upon a life of public service, Mr. COOPER soon became my personal friend and one upon whom I could rely and with whom I could exchange thoughts touching the multitude of heavy problems that have confronted our country and the Members of the Congress during the last quarter of a century.

The House of Representatives is a body that with fair accuracy appraises the worth of its Members. For one to attain highest success in this Chamber he must have unusual industry, he must be well informed, he must be accurate in his observations, he must be definite in his conclusions, he must be kindly toward his associates, and probably more than anything else, he must be possessed of mental and soul integrity.

Our late colleague possessed these qualities in most unusual degree. His personal habits were simple; his instincts and interests had to do with the masses of people of our country who are not in position to help themselves. It seemed to be his conception of the state that it exists for the purpose of carrying into actuality the high purposes that surrounded the establishment of our country, namely, its creation to promote equality and justice toward all, and with an apparent consciousness that there are millions of our countrymen at all times who are dependent upon the state itself for the translation of these purposes into vital factors.

During my membership in the House of Representatives there have been few Members who have been so widely read, so well informed upon so great a variety of subjects, so capable at all times of marshaling data and logic in support of conclusions, and of giving to their hearers in forceful, pleasing, and convincing style the results of their experience and their analysis of problems that they chose to present as HENRY ALLEN COOPER.

Probably the most outstanding characteristic of our late colleague was his frankness and his demand for frankness and candor upon the part of those who are entrusted with responsibility. Earnest and fearless himself, he seemed to be controlled in his demand for highest probity upon the part of others by the thought that in the language of another has taken this form: "Hateful to me as are the gates of hell is he who hiding one thing in his heart utters another."

In conclusion, the life of HENRY ALLEN COOPER briefly outlined in the words that I have used must continue to be an inspiration not only to the people of his district but to the membership of this body and to students everywhere who love honor, who love integrity, who love sincerity, and who are inspired by unselfish devotion on the part of a citizen as he seeks to serve the people as they constitute the state.

JAMES BENJAMIN ASWELL

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. Speaker, on March 16, 1931, in the tenth term of his service as Congressman from the eighth congressional district of Louisiana, at the very height and zenith of his wonderful public career, Dr. JAMES BENJAMIN ASWELL, educator, statesman, orator, passed from mortal into immortal life.

For over 18 years he had constantly and actively served his district, his State, and our Nation in these Congressional Halls. Now that he has passed into the silence and inaction of the grave, it is proper that we, the living, should assemble in this supreme shrine of his public devotion to pay to him and his memory the tribute of our memorials.

Doctor ASWELL was born December 23, 1869, on a farm in Jackson Parish, La., issue of the marriage of Benjamin Aswell and Elizabeth A. Lyles. He was married March 3, 1901, to Miss Ella Foster, of Shreveport, who survives him, together with two children, Mrs. James Edward Cantrill, of Lexington, Ky., and James B. Aswell, jr., writer and journalist, a resident of New York.

Doctor ASWELL showed in his early youth that resolute courage and indefatigable energy which enabled him to cope with and overcome the difficulties of life and which later made him one of the most outstanding men in the history of Louisiana.

Notwithstanding the poor opportunities afforded him for elementary education, he worked his way through school and equipped himself to enter the George Peabody College for Teachers, from which he graduated in 1892. He later received the degrees of A. B. and A. M. from the University of Nashville and the degree of LL. D. from the University of Arkansas.

Doctor ASWELL determined at the threshold of his young manhood to devote his life to the service of humanity. This high resolve was his constant incentive and ambition in his long career of public usefulness. There does not appear in the pages of Louisiana's history one who has served his State and its people with greater zeal and in more varied capacities than Dr. JAMES B. ASWELL.

Beginning his career as a teacher of youth, his ability as a public educator was speedily recognized, and his thirtieth year found him presiding over the Ruston Industrial Institute, now the Louisiana Polytechnic Institute. After devoting four years to that institution, he was by public acclaim drafted to serve as superintendent of education in Louisiana. So brilliant and successful was his work in that office that he has been frequently referred to as the father of the modern public-school system of Louisiana.

Having built up the Ruston Institute and the public-school system of his State, he next directed his remarkable faculties and tireless energy to the training of teachers, becoming in 1908 president of the State Normal College, located at Natchitoches, La.

During these years of service in various capacities in the cause of education his interest in public affairs generally had so broadened and his ability as a public speaker had become so recognized that again popular demand drafted him to another and larger field of service, and he was elected in 1912 to serve in the Halls of our National Congress. The most conclusive evidence, perhaps, of his ability as a statesman and the popular esteem in which he was held lies in the fact that from 1913 to the time of his death he remained constantly in Congress as the idolized Representative of the people of his district.

Time will not permit me, Mr. Speaker, to even chronicle the items of his varied and multitudinous activities in the legislative councils of our Nation. Every CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the Sixty-third Congress in 1913 to the Seventy-second Congress in 1931 is replete with the evidences of the broad statesmanship, the brilliant oratory, and the convincing logic of the Representative from Louisiana's eighth district. The United States veterans' hospital at Alexandria, La.; Federal buildings, national forest reserves, fish hatcheries, Federal flood control stand as monuments of his service to the people of his district; and his strenuous battles upon the floor of the House of Representatives for farm relief and national drought relief attest his vigorous and successful efforts in matters of national import.

Doctor ASWELL died, as he had lived, in the enjoyment of the unstinted admiration, confidence, and affection of the people of his district and State, and of his colleagues and coworkers in our National Capital, from the President of our Nation to the humblest clerk in its executive departments.

His high and useful service to his country will long endear him in the public memory.

This is the spontaneous and deserved tribute that fell from the lips of the present occupant of the White House upon the announcement of Doctor ASWELL's death.

In this commemoration of the life and service of our departed colleague we should be lacking in proper sentiment if our thoughts did not revert to those bound to him by the ties of nature and the fond associations of home and family, to the loving wife and devoted son and daughter, who "yearn for the touch of a vanished hand and sound of a voice that is still." We can not at this hour offer them a sweeter, dearer consolation than that which springs from a firm faith in the immortality of the soul and the divine assurance of an eternal union beyond the grave. And, apart from the assurance vouchsafed to humanity from on high, it may be truly said that, when death comes, the most consoling and the strongest conviction of the immortality of the soul and an eternal reunion is the immortality of love, which embraces faith and hope alike, which stands for the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God, and binds all humanity to the throne of the eternal loving Father.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. Speaker, regardless of the paths along which we are destined to make life's journey, we are certain to experience moments of joy and sorrow. Joys that inspire us to carry on with renewed effort in our undertakings and sorrows that cause us to reflect and to become disheartened.

Mr. Speaker, this day has been set aside and dedicated as memorial day, in order that we may pay tribute to the memory of those colleagues who departed this life during the past year. I bowed my head in sorrow and reflection as I listened to the names of those men whose presence so short a while ago graced this Chamber in the discharge of their public duties and whom the Father of all time has removed from our midst. Although their voices are silenced and they mingle no more with us in the body, the inspiration of their life's work still carries on.

Mr. Speaker, in this list of the illustrious departed is the name of one of Louisiana's distinguished sons, JAMES B. ASWELL, a man who devoted his entire life to the uplift of his fellow men; a man who was repeatedly honored by the citizens of his State and whom Louisiana in 1913 sent to this august body, where he served continuously until the time of his death. He was the dean of our delegation, by which he was held in high regard. He served fearlessly, faithfully, and capably not only the people of his State but of the entire Nation. His energy and ability were of great assistance to this country in solving many of the problems that arose during the period of the last war. After the war he continued as an indefatigable worker for the restoration of normalcy in the Nation. He was the farmers' friend and gave much of his time to the solution of agricultural problems. He was engaged in the last-named work, which was nearest his heart, when he was taken from us. His public service was an honor to his State and a credit to himself. He was a devoted son, a loving husband, and an affectionate father. He was a tried and true friend. To know him was to love him.

Whatever vales we yet may wander,
What sorrow come, what tempest blow,
We have a friend, a friend out yonder,
To greet us when we have to go—
Out yonder some one that we know.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep feeling of sorrow and a keen sense of regret that I endeavor to pay a tribute of admiration and respect to the memory of my colleague and friend the Hon. JAMES B. ASWELL. I am overwhelmed with sorrow because I have lost a warm personal friend, and I regret that Louisiana is deprived of one who was always devoted to the interests of his State and his people. His record in the House of Representatives shall always live as an eternal monument to his memory. He possessed a brilliant intellect, a magnetic personality; handsome and of striking personal appearance, fluent and forceful in speech, invincible in debate, and courageous in his convictions, he combined all of the elements of a legislator capable of leaving his imprint upon this historic body.

He had the broad culture necessary for the comprehensive grasp of high principles, a keenness of intellect that enabled him to reach proper conclusions, and the conscience to demand that the principles in which he believed be applied to administration. He fought for the public weal, even though his actions were in conflict with his personal welfare. He was a strong, patriotic citizen. His actions were guided and directed by his loyalty and his earnest desire to serve well his country and State. One of his outstanding characteristics was his devotion to duty. I know of no public man of our day who served so zealously and more willingly for his constituents. He sacrificed his very life to carry out their expressed wish.

In the passing of my friend Louisiana has lost a great citizen and our Nation has lost a patriotic statesman. He was elected to serve his people; he performed his duties admirably; he did his work nobly; and it is with profound sorrow that we of the Louisiana delegation mourn his untimely death.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, our deceased colleague JAMES B. ASWELL, whose memory we honor to-day, was born in Jackson Parish, La., December 23, 1869. He was the son of Benjamin W. and Elizabeth Lyles Aswell.

The father, an honorable and patriotic citizen, was a soldier in the Confederate States Army. His mother, the charming director of a simple home, still the foundation and hope of genuine progress and advancement of the human race.

His first educational training was in the country public schools of his home community and State. After a college course at Arcadia, La., he was awarded a scholarship to the George Peabody College for Teachers at Nashville, Tenn., from which institution he graduated with honor and distinction. He also received degrees from the University of Nashville, the University of Arkansas, and recognition from other noted educational institutions. On account of such merited and deserved honors, he was properly termed Doctor ASWELL.

While his life presents an unusual record in lines of usefulness, the outstanding accomplishments of Doctor ASWELL were as an educator and a statesman. To become noted as either is an honor; to advance to leadership in both is a distinction coming only to a few.

Whether it be in the 1-room country school or the college, his record as a student is remembered by his associates. As an instructor or executive in such institutions, his leadership was gladly followed by his coworkers.

As president of Louisiana Industrial Institute, now Louisiana Polytechnic Institute, at Ruston, La., and president of the Louisiana State Normal College, at Natchitoches, La., and as superintendent of public education in his native State, he planned and formulated the basis of the system of public education by which Louisiana ranks among the first States of the Union in this important field.

From close and cherished relations with our departed friend, I would say that if he should be listening in to-day on this memorial service, he would prefer that his work and career as an educator be given first rank in the records of his public service. And why not? The safety and security of a democracy rest upon the training and equipment of the youth who must constitute its mature citizenship and assume all responsibility for its religious, social, private, and official life.

During his 18 years in Congress as Representative from the eighth congressional district of Louisiana, Doctor ASWELL established a record of public service comprising in all respects the highest qualities of statesmanship.

Complete devotion to and aggressive action for the promotion and advancement of every problem and interest affecting his own congressional district, his native State, and the Nation at large established for him recognized leadership in the Congress in respect to some of the most important problems demanding solution by national legislative action. Due to the length of his previous service, in the Seventy-first Congress he was advanced to the position of ranking minority member of the powerful Committee on Agriculture.

For the emergency farm-relief legislation made necessary by the unprecedented drought disaster of 1930, Congressman ASWELL became the leader, the sponsor, and the author. In September, 1930, I came to Washington at his request to assist and cooperate with him. I therefore know personally of his plans and work, the foundation for the results obtained.

The fact that the world-wide depression, affecting every phase of industry and agriculture, then unforeseen, has made it necessary to continue financial assistance to farmers by the Federal Government, again emphasizes the outstanding service rendered by JAMES B. ASWELL.

Other instances of leadership could be given. The people of Louisiana know his record, realize the immeasurable loss sustained, and join us to-day in the tributes of honor to his memory.

The untimely passing of our beloved and honored colleague was due to burdens of overwork. He had been advised and cautioned of this. But with determination for service to his people, unfaltering Christian faith and devotion to his loved ones, he continued forward and passed quietly on, still in the battle and on the front line. What a privilege!

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I well know that there will be offered by various of my colleagues many eulogies of the late Speaker. All of them will be by Members of the House of Representatives who served with and under him. I shall add my tribute from the point of view of one who knew him only outside of his official life.

Though NICHOLAS LONGWORTH was some years my senior, I can not remember when I did not know him. His home was near to mine in Cincinnati, and I well recall the admiration that I had, as a boy, for the attractive, debonair young man who had just been elected to Congress. As I grew older and came to know him better, I always looked forward to those times when he would come back to his home for extended stays between sessions of Congress, with intimate and interesting stories of the kaleidoscope of national figures and events.

When the late Speaker's sudden death came last spring, the whole community which had honored him for so many years by sending him to Washington, and which he had in turn honored by his career of ever-increasing service and prestige, joined with the Nation in its sorrow and in its desire to do honor to his memory. I myself mourned the passing of a real friend.

When I was selected by my party to stand for the vacant seat of NICHOLAS LONGWORTH I felt the honor keenly. It was more than being selected to run for Congress; it was being asked to succeed one of the great men of the Nation, and in this spirit, and with full knowledge of my own inadequacy, I entered the race. When my constituents saw fit to elect me, and I came, an ignorant neophyte, to Washington, it was the prestige and position which had been held by my distinguished predecessor which provided an open sesame to the friendship of my colleagues. I know well that it was because of their love for him that I was made particularly welcome in the Halls of Congress, and I am deeply appreciative.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH was one man in a thousand. He possessed in a higher degree than I have ever seen in anyone an ability to understand and appreciate his fellow man. Everyone who knew him, no matter how slightly, felt him a friend. His tact, his good fellowship, his humor were proverbial. He knew when to laugh and when to be solemn. He knew that while at times the importance of national and international affairs must naturally cause them to be treated with the utmost seriousness, he also knew that the great saving grace of this life is an ability to laugh with and at the fates; and he realized keenly that no man, be he ever so great, should take himself too seriously. In this he typified an attitude which we should all cultivate, and when the call came was able "to greet the unseen with a cheer."

He was well educated, well read, quick and versatile in thought; and in addition he had a side to him which was not given to all to know. He had an unusual knowledge of and love for fine music, and many who knew him as a statesman or as a gay companion would have been surprised to see him staying up for hours late at night playing the violin with a group of musicians of the first rank and holding his own.

A fascinating figure has left his accustomed haunts, but the world is a more human and livable place because he lived in it.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, the passing of NICHOLAS LONGWORTH was for me a heartfelt personal loss. I esteemed him as an elder brother, a preceptor, and friend. I have heard that he was always willing to oblige the fledglings—the first-termers of Congress. Possibly, as a fellow townsman, he did more for me, and I am under many obligations to him for making smoother the rough spots. His advice was always unselfish.

It is a consolation that I showed my feeling for him during his lifetime. On one occasion, at a dinner given in his honor, I was invited also, and will read from my notes, luckily preserved, what I then said:

I am especially pleased to be here to join you in doing honor to my chief, Speaker NICHOLAS LONGWORTH. He worthily fills the second highest position in the National Government. He has the respect of partisan foes as well as the affection of partisan friends. It is no small thing to guide the destiny of a House composed of 435 Representatives eminent in their respective localities, men of decided individualities, and yet NICHOLAS LONGWORTH does this and holds their general good will, because in all situations he is and remains the gentleman.

I rejoice that the custom is growing to give to the living, flowers of speech and acclaim when they deserve them, and know of no one who better deserves such recognition than our fellow townsman, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH. For he's a jolly good fellow.

Those last words, "For he's a jolly, good fellow" may require some explanation, except to those who have experienced the charm of an evening with LONGWORTH as host. Mr. LONGWORTH was a lover of music—he rarely missed a good concert. He was a musician of great proficiency on the piano, violin, and organ. When at his ease among his intimates, he regaled his guests with song, story, and music, and there would ensue a "feast of reason and flow of soul," long to be remembered and cherished. He made friends easily and kept them.

He was a Member of the House of Representatives for 13 terms and elected for a fourteenth term. Those who served during the last three terms of Congress know he was the ideal Speaker. He had a thorough knowledge of parliamentary law and the rules of the House. On one occasion only was an appeal from his decision sustained on the floor, and later he had the satisfaction of having his original ruling become the action of the House on another measure. Rigidly impartial, his fair dealing was recognized by all, and at the close of each of his three terms as Speaker there was demonstration of good feeling in honor of Mr. LONGWORTH.

Who of us will ever forget the 4th of March last? Then Mr. LONGWORTH said, in part:

I need not say that I am profoundly grateful for this demonstration of your affection. Perhaps this is the last time I will address you from this rostrum. [The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD interjects here "laughter and applause."]

Mr. LONGWORTH jocularly continued:

I do not mean to insinuate that I regard it as a probability, but I must admit it as a possibility.

In serious vein he proceeded:

The decision lies with none of us here. It is a decision that lies with an all-wise Providence.

Slightly more than a month later he died.

I am not one of those who believe he anticipated his own death. Having received a unanimous party-caucus nomination for reelection as Speaker shortly before, he was directly referring prophetically to the deaths which might and have changed the political complexion of the House. He knew that such deaths occur between terms of Congress, and therefore his nomination did not mean his certain election to the Speakership.

True, his next sentence was:

With whatever Providence may decree I am abundantly satisfied.

This is a personal reference, but I take it as a confession of faith on the part of this Christian gentleman, and not as premonitory of his death. We can not forget his genial spirits when he delivered this farewell speech. Shortly thereafter he yielded to a draft and played for us the piano accompaniment to "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny." He was noticeably tired, but apparently in health.

The shock of his death was felt throughout the Nation. I learned of it by wireless at Cristobal, Panama, and it was my sad duty to transmit this first information to the officers aboard ship and at the garrison. Soon our flag was at half-mast and genuine sorrow was shown there and everywhere on my trip to the Pacific coast, reluctantly resumed after it proved impossible to journey to Cincinnati, even by airplane, in time for the funeral services.

Cincinnati has long cherished the name of LONGWORTH as one intertwined with its growth and progress from its early history to the present time. Cincinnati mourns the death of Speaker LONGWORTH as the loss of its most distinguished citizen.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, announcement of the death of our beloved Speaker, Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, so shortly following the adjournment of the Seventy-first Congress, smote heavily with sorrow the hearts of his colleagues and legion of friends, and brought to me the shock of personal bereavement.

I desire to voice brief and humble tribute to this great public official and statesman, whose name will be prominently engraved in our Nation's history.

I had a deep affection for our late colleague, which only increased with the length of our association. I admired him for his kindly personal qualities and his high attainments, respected his sound judgment and decisions, and was happy to follow his leadership of Republican forces in the House.

The whole public career of NICK LONGWORTH was a splendid exemplification of the highest conception of service. He was the highest type of public servant it has been my privilege to know.

Especially did I admire his loyalty to the Republican Party and its principles, as well as his advocacy of sound party government. In this connection I often recall a speech he delivered before the Union League of Philadelphia on May 27, 1926, when as an introduction to a scholarly address on the virtues of party government, he said:

I hear you had an election here recently. Well, I am not here to comment on the result. I know the primaries sometimes leave heart burnings. I am not here to offer advice. I would not presume to do so. But I know what I would do in the circumstances. I would vote for every man nominated on the Republican ticket.

Dwelling further on the subject of party loyalty, he appropriately illustrated his point as follows:

The first thing I did when I left college was to join a political club. As a member of that club, I gained my first lesson in what a Republican organization ought to have: First, real cooperation, whether the individual attains high estate or not, and then firm loyalty.

I remember that as a member of the Ohio Legislature I went home to join my club in a parade. My train was late. I joined in the rear of the column and walked with three aged, diminutive men. We had the dust in our faces and the band was around the corner. I said to one of my companions, "Well, I don't like this." "Young man," he said, "I don't know who you are, but let me say this: I have been a member of this club for 25 years, and I have never missed a parade, and I have never heard the band play yet."

That—

is the spirit that wins our victories.

Mr. LONGWORTH spoke highly in praise of service in the House of Representatives, and considered his position as Speaker as one of the highest honors to which a man could aspire.

There is no greater leveler in the world than the House.

He said.

It makes no difference what a man was, men are judged in the House by what they are and what they do.

The House is daily in contact with the people of the country, and so long as it may merit the confidence of the people, no real danger can come to the Republic we all love.

My closest contact with Mr. LONGWORTH was during the period of our service together on the Republican steering committee, of which he was chairman when majority leader and an ex officio member when Speaker. I always found him to be most genial and affable and possessed of a personality which made and kept friends. He was thoroughly versed in every aspect of government; and while not one of the country's outstanding orators, he possessed the fine art of convincing firmness and expounded his arguments in a manner that they could be readily understood and leave a lasting impression.

Mr. Speaker, the Nation mourns the loss of its outstanding public servant and statesman, and we who served with him here suffer from the lost opportunity of personal association with him and the benefit of his wise counsel and leadership.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when NICHOLAS LONGWORTH laid down the Speaker's gavel for the last time, the country lost a great leader. Some men are astute politicians, some are scholars, some revel in the æsthetic, art, literature, music. Fortunate, but rare, it is that men are the happy composite of all of these. Such a man was NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

His rise to the position of power, second only to that of the President of the United States, was conscientiously and meritoriously earned. Membership for four years in the assembly and senate of his State was the first step that enabled the 33-year-old "boy Representative from Ohio" to find a seat in the House of Representatives. Thirty-two years of public service in State and National office prepared him for the success that was his in the high office of Speaker of the House.

That his influence would be far-reaching was early demonstrated when he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Intensive self-training and invaluable public good came out of his years of service on the Ways and Means Committee. He became an authority on matters requiring economic judgment—revenues, tariffs, and taxes.

In the rôle of floor leader, when for two years, 1923–1925, he steered the Republican Party through difficult times which threatened a serious split between progressives and conservatives, he exercised amazingly balanced political judgment, and achieved for that Congress an almost unprecedented legislative record.

My own relations with NICK LONGWORTH were always most delightful. We served in the House together more than 20 years. He came to the House one Congress before I did. In all my experience with him I found him always a man true to his word. He was frank and honest; and when he made a promise, he kept it.

Well do I remember when, at the beginning of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the progressive group held the balance of power. With Democratic coalition this group could overrule the Republican majority at any time. Mr. LONGWORTH had assumed leadership, but he was attempting an impossible task. Some of the conservative group had advised him to give up even trying to organize the House. An old fight for liberalization of the rules of the House had been carried over from the previous Congress. I was chairman of the progressive group and asked for a conference with Mr. LONGWORTH.

The result of this conference was a compromise which eventually led to many changes in the rules, more particularly to the discharge of bills from the committees. He was always fair, and tried to see the opponent's point of view, which was one of the reasons for his great popularity as Speaker.

When his name was presented for candidacy to the high office of Speaker, among the many reasons set forth in favor of his election were his 22 years of faithful service in the House, his profound study of legislation and parliamentary procedure, his unfailing diligence in attendance to the business of the House.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH was a man of particularly engaging personality, which would have won him a place of honor and responsibility aside from his recognized ability. He possessed a delightful sense of humor, was an interesting and informed conversationalist, and a master of cogent and vigorous argument. He was unfailingly courteous to opposing opinion, and never indulged in discourteous remarks or caustic humor.

He had independence of judgment. It took courage in the campaign of 1912 to stand by his belief and for party allegiance in support of William H. Taft against his father-in-law, Theodore Roosevelt. He did it. It cost him a term in Congress.

Earnestly and zealously he upheld high standards of official conduct. He consistently strove to attain the ideals he expressed in the House on that December 7, 1925, when he took his oath of office as Speaker:

> While my ambition to successfully perform the duties of the Speakership is high, I believe, as my personal ambition can be, I cherish also an ambition less personal in its nature which is even higher.
> I want to effectively assist in bringing about universal recognition of the fact that the House, closer as it is to the people than any similar body and more directly responsive to their will, is in very truth, as it ought to be, the great dominant legislative assembly of the world. Thus we may rest assured that the Republic of the United States shall forever live and that popular representative government shall never die.

During the years of his able leadership, elected Speaker three times, he accomplished much in balancing the relationship between the two legislative branches of Congress, bringing them nearer the unity intended by the Constitution of the United States.

Ability and pleasing personality are great endowments. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH had both. It was said of him that his "death would cause more sincere grief among more people than that of any other man in public life" and that he had "more real personal friends than any other and would be missed in more ways by more different groups, and for a longer time."

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it was my great privilege to be a Member of the House of Representatives during the time when the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH served as Speaker of the House.

As a presiding officer, he was always fair in his rulings, universally liked by all Members regardless of politics. Although the presiding officer, he was always in sympathy and fair in his dealings with Members of all political faiths.

As evidence of the high esteem of his associates and friends, I include eulogies from the following individuals and official groups:

THE SIXTEENTH LEGISLATURE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
THE SENATE,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 10, 1931.

THE HONORABLE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to transmit herewith Senate Resolution No. 28, which was this day adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii.

Very respectfully,

ELLEN D. SMYTHE, Clerk of the Senate.

Resolution—Senate Resolution No. 28

Whereas the sun has prematurely set on the life of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH and he has passed forever from our mortal vision, although the memory of him and his accomplishments will linger with us always; and

Whereas we realize what a great loss his passing will be to the Republican Party and to the Congress of the United States, where he has been Speaker of the House of Representatives for the past six years, and where he has served as a Republican member over a period of 30 years; and

Whereas, ever since he entered politics, three decades ago, he has been recognized as a statesman without a peer; and

Whereas, he was a man whose heart was as big as his brain was brilliant, and whose thoughts were focused ever on the good he could do for others, regardless of the cost to himself; and

Whereas, we, the members of the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii are cognizant of the friendly attitude he has maintained toward this Territory, and whom many of us have been privileged to know personally and to have thus learned to appreciate his sterling character, as well as his eminent statesmanship: Now therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii, session of 1931, do by this means express our deep regret that his career has been brought to a close at a time when his highest ambitions and ideals were being realized; and be it further

Resolved, That we, the members of the senate here assembled, do extend to his widow, Alice Roosevelt Longworth, and to his family, our deepest sympathy in this, their hour of bereavement; and to extend the comfort of the thought of Longfellow that:

> "There is no Death! What seems so is transition;
> This life of mortal breath
> Is but a suburb of the life elysian, > Whose portal we call Death."

and be it further

Resolved, That we do express to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States our sincere regret at the loss to them of their much loved and honored Speaker, who possessed the rare combination of the knowledge of and sympathy with mankind, coupled with his ability as a leader; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be adopted by a rising vote and that when the senate adjourns to-day it does so out of respect to the memory of NICHOLAS LONGWORTH—a man whose friends loved him and whose political enemies had for him the highest respect; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to Mrs. Longworth and to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T. H., April 10, 1931.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was this day adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii.

President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

House Joint Resolution No. 9, expressing the sorrow of the General Assembly of the State of Delaware at the news of the death of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington and a Member of that body from the State of Ohio

Whereas the General Assembly of the State of Delaware has just learned with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States at Washington and a Member of that body from the State of Ohio; and

Whereas the deceased was not only recognized as an eminent lawyer but served the people of his State of Ohio on their boards of education in their State senate, and in many other positions of trust and responsibility at home as well as nearly 30 years in the Congress of the United States and was recognized by the people of the United States, irrespective of party affiliation, as one of the outstanding Americans of the age, and one who in his long and honorable service gave to the people of his State and country the benefits of a learned and efficient statesmanship; and

Whereas by the death of Mr. LONGWORTH the country sustains an irreparable loss: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware in general assembly met, That the General Assembly of the State of Delaware by this resolution, in its humble manner, desires to express its sorrow at the great loss the country has sustained in the death of Mr. LONGWORTH and to extend to his bereaved family its sympathy in this hour of its great trouble; and

That a duly certified copy of this resolution be sent to the National House of Representatives and to his widow, Alice Roosevelt Longworth.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES STATE OF TEXAS,
Austin, April 13, 1931.

Hon. WILLIAM TYLER PAGE,
Clerk House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: On April 10 the House of Representatives of the Texas Legislature adopted the inclosed resolution expressing its sympathy and joining the American people in their grief at the death of Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

The members of the Legislature of Texas were deeply grieved by the passing of this great American and greatly deplore the loss which his death has occasioned the people of this Nation.

Very truly yours,

LOUISE SNOW PHINNEY,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Resolution

Whereas on yesterday, April 9, Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, of the city of Cincinnati, and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the American Congress, was called by death; and

Whereas the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Texas, upon being advised of his death, appointed a committee from the house to prepare and submit to this house suitable and proper resolutions on the death of this distinguished American; and

Whereas Texas shares in common with her sister States the grief and loss occasioned by the death of this outstanding son of the great State of Ohio, she also recalls and pauses now to express a remembered gratitude to Cincinnati and Ohio for the sympathy and support accorded by them to Texas in the struggle and achievement of the young Republic; and

Whereas the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER in his tribute appearing in to-day's press, to the memory of Mr. LONGWORTH, expresses the feelings and sentiments of the people of Texas, and which is as follows:

"I was intimately associated with Speaker LONGWORTH for nearly 30 years. We were elected to Congress the same year and from the beginning served on the same committees—Foreign Affairs and Ways and Means. He went to the Speakership; I, to the leadership of the Democratic minority. I knew him as a man and as a legislator and he was the best type of each. His statesmanship was of the highest and most patriotic; true he was a partisan, but he was honest and courageous and loved his country. He was as fair and impartial a Speaker as the country has had in the last half century. He was a regular Republican, which means that he believed in party organization and party responsibility, which is the opinion of most men who have had experience in legislative efforts. It has been our constant habit for years to meet each evening after Congress adjourned and discuss the happenings of the day and the probable happenings of the to-morrow. In these late afternoon conferences we often discussed the policies of the Congress in a patriotic spirit, and many propositions were solved. A good many of them are on the statute books to-day. Of course we had differences, and our political fights were sometimes intense, even tinged with acrimony, but there was always respect for the views of each and a realization that each was trying to serve his country from his respective point of view. When the fight was over, our efforts were celebrated in the usual manner, differences forgotten, and good fellowship resumed. LONGWORTH and I were closely associated socially. I had the pleasure of attending his wedding. He was an aristocrat; I am a plebeian. Perhaps the very fact of our different rearing intensified our interest in each other. I have lost one of the best friends of a lifetime, the country a good citizen, and the Congress a most valuable legislator." Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Texas, That it express its approval of the sympathy and sentiments expressed by Hon. JOHN N. GARNER on the death of Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH; that we concur in the estimate he formed and held of this great American; we appreciate and deplore the loss which his death has occasioned the American people, and we join Cincinnati and Ohio in their grief.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Chief Clerk of the Congress of the United States and to the Governor of the State of Ohio, and the mayor of the city of Cincinnati.

To the honorable CLERK OF THE
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith House Joint Resolution 104, by Pitts, pertaining to the death of Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker of the House of Representatives. This as requested in the joint resolution.

Yours very truly,
PETE B. JARMAN, Jr.,
Secretary of State.

House joint resolution

Whereas death has come to NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker of the National House of Representatives, a wise and good man, and

Whereas Mr. LONGWORTH was always just in his political dealings, his justice knowing no party lines: Therefore

This legislature expresses its sorrow at his death and its sense of loss at his passing.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state of Alabama shall send a copy of this resolution to the National House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Approved April 21, 1931.

HARRISBURG, PA.,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 14, 1931.

While yet in love with life and raptured with the world, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker, statesman, artist, and gentleman, swiftly passed into that dreamless silence of the dead;

Tolerant, tactful, fair, and honest, he takes his place in history as an outstanding wielder of the gavel in our National House of Representatives;

Born of wealth, reared in luxury, educated without stint, when man's estate arrived, he mixed and mingled with the crowds, and on his own he climbed the mountain peak;

The artistry of the skilled musician, the aggressiveness of the politician, the fearlessness of the statesman, the fineness of the gentleman, combined to make a man, respected by his fellow men;

While eager, kindly winds were kissing every sail of life's frail bark and carrying on to better, richer ports, he struck the unseen rock that lurks beneath the silver sea and now the billows roll above that stricken craft and he is gone;

With many milestones left unpassed upon the road of life and ere the setting sun had cast its taller shadows to the east, he wearied of the trail and fell asleep;

A life whose every moment gleamed with love of friends and every hour was studded thick with jewels of memory became too soon a sad and sorrowing tragedy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the passing of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, the House of Representatives has lost a fair, impartial, and fearless Speaker, and a Member who possessed the qualities of genuine statesmanship;

That the Nation has lost a strong and outstanding figure, who contributed his all to the common good;

That the district he represented has been deprived of the services of one who knew its needs and whose public career was a credit to it;

That while we feel the ineffectiveness of any act of ours to in any way assuage the grief and loss of those who must deeply mourn his loss, we extend to them our deepest and most profound sympathy;

That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the chief clerk of the house to the widow of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, and to the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and that they be spread upon the journal of this house.

The foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolution passed in the house of representatives, the fourteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred thirty-one.

Speaker, House of Representatives.
E. F. WHITE,
Chief Clerk, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 16, 1931.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained therein, there is transmitted herewith a copy of a cablegram quoting a resolution of condolence passed by the Senate of Porto Rico upon the death of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, late Speaker of the House of Representatives, which has just been received from the Hon. Luis Sanchez Morales, president of the Senate of Porto Rico.

A copy of the above cablegram has been transmitted to the President of the Senate.

Respectfully,
PATRICK J. HURLEY,
Secretary of War.

(1 inclosure.)

APRIL 10, 1931.

The Hon. PATRICK J. HURLEY,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to inform you that at a meeting held to-day the Senate of Porto Rico adopted the following resolution expressing the condolence of the Senate of Porto Rico on the death of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

Whereas the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, a Member of Congress and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, has departed this life;

Whereas the death of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH represents a sad and immense loss to the American people, while to Porto Rico it means the loss of a friend who was always ready to cooperate in benefit of the interest of our island.

Whereas the deceased was the brother-in-law of our governor, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt:

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate of Porto Rico (1) to state and enter on the record the fact that the senate has with deep sorrow learned of the death of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH; (2) to transmit a cablegram to the widow of the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, the Congress of the United States, and the President of the Nation, expressing to them our most sincere condolence; (3) to designate a committee to call upon the Governor of Porto Rico to express to him our participation in his sorrow.

The senate also resolved to adjourn to-day's meeting as an expression of sorrow over the death of Speaker LONGWORTH.

I beg of you to inform Speaker LONGWORTH'S widow, his Excellency President Hoover, and the Congress of the United States of the resolution transcribed above.

LUIS SANCHEZ MORALES,
President of the Senate.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, the tragedy of our American life is the fact that the sons of our wealthy citizens take so little interest in governmental affairs, especially in the House of Representatives. The late Speaker, who came into this House to serve his district and the Nation through many years leaves a career that merits the plaudits of all good citizens, and his example should be emulated by future sons of the well-to-do. The life in the House is no flowery bed of ease, but it is the great arena of statesmanship, where all must stand or fall upon merit alone. Here wealth will not win nor poverty prejudice.

In the very early days of my apprenticeship, in the war days, I first came in personal contact with the late Speaker. I had voted to let Colonel Roosevelt go to France; and since I was a Democrat, he came to express his appreciation.

He understood the hardships of a new Member and was always genial and approachable. He was more concerned about having the good wishes of his colleagues and their esteem than any office in the gift of the Nation.

I think probably there are few places where the measure of a man is more completely taken than right here among Members of this House, and it is said of Mr. LONGWORTH that no man had more real friends, not only among his party associates but among those of the opposing political faith.

He was a great party leader, a greater Speaker; and when the gavel fell, as it were, from the grasp of his nerveless hand, he passed over the divide to preside in the hall of the great of all times.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the entire American Continent mourned the death of NICHOLAS LONGWORTH. He had a warm place in the hearts of his fellow Americans. No wonder. He was intensely human. His kindly nature was unspoiled by political conflicts and the responsibilities of official station. He was a manly man.

To me his sudden, tragic, and pathetic passing terminated a personal friendship which daily association in a common official and political relationship had created over a period of more than eight years.

Prior to his election as majority leader of the House our acquaintanceship was comparatively casual, merely that of two Members of the House serving on different committees whose contacts were chiefly on the floor of the House.

The election of Mr. LONGWORTH as leader of the Republican Party in the House came at a time which tested his capacity for leadership. He met the test. A small group in his own party held the balance of power and demanded concessions for their support. The problems arising out of this situation he met and solved with that natural ability and finesse which characterized his whole career. He had the happy faculty of conciliating his foes and keeping his friends, and at the same time preserving his principles. He would never sacrifice his convictions for the sake of expediency. He had the approbation of his own conscience. His affability and his good judgment, combined with rare tact and discretion, won for him the affection of the House.

When he aspired to the Speakership of the House, having won his spurs as majority leader, he contended with his friend the late beloved Martin Madden, himself a leader and political antagonist, who proved to be a worthy foeman. Both men had earned the respect and admiration of their party associates, and a choice between them was no easy task. They fought a good fight, Mr. LONGWORTH winning out; but the result left no scars and Speaker LONGWORTH entered upon his duties with the good will and cooperation of his fellow Republicans, and with the esteem of his friends on the Democratic side.

The high regard in which Mr. LONGWORTH was held extended into every stratum of political and social life, from the highest to the lowest. An aristocrat to the manner born, yet his life was simple and unaffected and his manners democratic and those of a true gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH'S three terms as Speaker of the House were distinguished for his fairness and for his wise rulings. He added prestige to the House. He actually raised the House, none too popular at any time, to a place of respect and admiration in the Nation. He was proud of the body over which he presided with consummate skill, and his zealous regard for its dignity and place in our governmental scheme won the plaudits of its Members regardless of party.

Mr. LONGWORTH was a partisan when occasion demanded partisan action, but his partisanship was never offensive.

He believed, to quote his own words, that—

> The basic principles which have made the Republican Party what it has been and is to-day, the true medium for the expression of the desires and aspirations of the majority of the people of the United States.

Yet in the office of Speaker, as presiding officer of the House, one could not have discerned from his conduct to which party he was attached, so well did he exemplify his own ideal and conception of the character of that high station.

Upon assuming the Speakership the first time, he announced his belief and purpose concerning the office and its proper administration in these words:

> The functions and duties of the Speakership, as I view them, divide themselves into two general classes, the one parliamentary, the other political.
> The first I propose to administer with most rigid impartiality, with an eye single to the maintenance in the fullest degree of the dignity and honor of the House, and the rights and privileges of its Members. I promise you that there will be no such thing as favoritism in the treatment by the Chair of either parties or individuals.

That he kept faith with himself and with the House is amply attested by the genuine high regard and affection of his associates on both sides of the House. The feelings of the Members, without exception, toward Speaker LONGWORTH could not be better expressed than by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], himself an able legislator and parliamentarian and the son of a former Speaker, when at the close of the last Congress, not long before Speaker LONGWORTH'S gavel fell for the last time, Mr. CRISP uttered this encomium, which also was a requiem:

> I recall that when our distinguished Speaker first assumed the chair he made this statement, that as a Representative from one of the congressional districts of Ohio he was a partisan; that as the Speaker of the House he would know no partisanship but would be the Speaker of the entire body and faithfully, fairly, courteously, and impartially discharge the duties of that great office. I desire to say that he has kept faith and lived up to that promise. He will take rank as one of the great Speakers of this House.

We miss the wise counsel, the unfaltering leadership, the inspiration, and the amiable fellowship of our beloved friend NICK LONGWORTH.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, Shakespeare has referred to "wisdom" as "a word that all men love." Wisdom deserves this response, for in the long run wisdom spells success, and lack of wisdom spells failure, in every field of endeavor. Wisdom outstanding in his chosen field characterized our late and loved Speaker, Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, of Ohio.

Other qualifications were his in abundance. His splendid abilities were self-evident. These abilities, asserted early in life, enabled him to serve his city and his State as a member of the school board in Cincinnati, as a representative and as a senator in the Legislature of Ohio. These abilities also carried him into the service of the Nation, electing him to Congress no less than 14 times. They won for him important committee assignments in the House. They made him its majority leader. They brought him ultimately the highest honor which his colleagues could confer upon him—the speakership—a high office to which he was three times elected; a high office which he filled with dignity, with courage, and with fairness to all.

Human qualities were also his in full measure. His understanding of human nature, his generosity, his humor, his good-fellowship, these and other characteristics endeared him to the Members of the House and won for him a host of friends in every walk of life.

His wisdom made him a great Speaker of the House of Representatives. No one who knew him as presiding officer and leader of his party in the House could fail to recognize his rare foresight, his unusual power to estimate accurately the result which could be attained, his unerring skill in finding the means best suited to its attainment, his ability in a word to make the right application of knowledge.

Those of us who were privileged to serve with him as friend and as colleague can best appreciate the value to the Nation of his experience, of his wisdom, of his life of public service. We can best appreciate, Mr. Speaker, in these difficult times, when in every walk of life the world cries out for intelligent and effective leadership, how great was America's loss in the passing of our loved leader.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day according to custom to pay tribute to the memory of those of our colleagues who have passed to the Great Beyond since the last session of Congress. But this day has more than special significance, since among those who have left our midst is our beloved friend and former Speaker, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

But three Speakers in the history of the House occupied longer the chair to which Mr. LONGWORTH was elevated by the Republican membership after 20 years of service in the House. Prior to his election as Speaker he had served with distinction as Republican floor leader and as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

It was my pleasure to meet Speaker LONGWORTH for the first time in the spring of 1915, following my first election to the House of Representatives, when he came to Atlantic City to address a Republican gathering there. We became rather well acquainted in the several days which he spent in Atlantic City, and that acquaintance ripened into a warm and sincere friendship which I shall ever cherish as one of the happy memories of my service in the National Congress. At the time of his death it was my great privilege to hold a closer relationship with him than perhaps any other Member of the House.

Speaker LONGWORTH was an exceptional man in many ways; he might well be referred to as an "institution" as a result of his long and valuable service in the House of Representatives. A brilliant scholar, a statesman of accomplished attainments, a master of parliamentary law and procedure, he will go down in history ranking high among the few really great Speakers of the House.

A gentleman to the manner born, he was possessed of a magnetic personality and with it all a "man's man." To have the good fortune to know him intimately was indeed a real privilege, for to know him was to appreciate his abundant good qualities and to love him for his rare charm.

It was my pleasure, as one of his close friends and advisers, to sponsor and take an active interest in his first election as Speaker of the House. There was considerable opposition to his candidacy, and it was no easy matter to defeat his opponent, the late and lamented Martin B. Madden, who had served in the House for so many years with honor and distinction. The record left by our departed friend as Speaker of the House will ever remain a mark of high tribute from him to the friends who loyally stood by him and contributed to his election to the highest office in the National Congress. If, in the years which I have already served in the House and to those to come, my service to my country shall otherwise be little noted, I shall always feel that in helping to elect NICHOLAS LONGWORTH as Speaker of the House I have in no small measure contributed to the future history of our country.

As I think of him now my memory goes back to the closing day of the Seventy-first Congress, when he addressed his colleagues for the last time, and I wonder what prophetic vision prompted him at that time. His short address to the House on that occasion is well worth repeating here as a reminder to all of the uncertainty of life and the futility of speculating upon what the future holds in store for us. At that moment the make-up of the House was such as to practically assure his reelection as Speaker in the next Congress. He said:

> Perhaps this is the last time I will address you from this rostrum. It is only an all-wise Providence who is going to determine which of the two major parties will organize the next House. With whatever Providence may decree, I am abundantly satisfied. If I am to retire from this office, I do so with profound gratitude to my colleagues, not so much for having elected me to this, the greatest office in any legislative branch in any government of the world, but more for the evidence of the esteem and confidence you have had in me.

It is a strange coincidence that from that time on the hand of Death should have been laid upon a sufficient number of our membership to change the political majority in the Congress and assure the election of the present Democratic Speaker.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, how rapid the change in personnel in a legislative body that we believe to be perpetual may be indicated by the fact that after 28 years only five Members whose original services commenced with the Fifty-eighth Congress, March 4, 1903, entered upon their services as Members of the present Congress. About 121 Representatives were elected for the first time in 1902.

The five who entered at that time who were elected in 1930 to the Seventy-second Congress were the late Speaker of the House of Representatives, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH; the present Speaker, JOHN N. GARNER; the Democratic floor leader, HENRY T. RAINEY; the distinguished Representative from Wisconsin, WILLIAM H. STAFFORD; and myself.

Shortly after the commencement of the present Congress, however, this circle was broken by the passing of our late Speaker. The Members of the Congress, regardless of party, were controlled by one thought in the death of Mr. LONGWORTH, namely, that they had lost a personal friend.

Others will refer to the intimate features of the life of the late Speaker. May I refer to just a few of his characteristics that impressed me as a coworker?

Probably no group more accurately or more relentlessly appraises the worth and fitness of the individual Members of the group than does the House of Representatives. Here all meet upon a common plane; here there is no place for sham; here there is no place for hypocrisy; here there is no place for dishonorable practice; here there is no place for bluntness and discourtesies; no place for any of these frailties for the man whose service would be long and influential. Certainly there is no place for such things upon the part of one who may be chosen by his colleagues to fill responsible positions within the gift of the Members of the House.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH was a man of ability. He was educated and trained in our foremost institutions of learning. He was possessed of an aptitude for matters pertaining to government. He was well informed, broadly read, possessed of wide acquaintanceship among people of our country and other countries who were most worth while. He was tremendously devoted to the principles that his conscience told him were right and sound. He was persistent as a student and as a legislator, and yet probably the one thing that characterized the late Speaker more than anything else and brought him the degree of success that attached to his name was his kindliness toward his fellow Members.

Mr. LONGWORTH's service was broken by but one term. He was repeatedly reelected because of his strength as a legislator and as a man, and he continued to maintain his position of leadership in the House of Representatives because he was recognized among his colleagues as a man of strength. He was aggressive, but he was kindly. He was a leader but he led by being himself in the front and by being fair and just toward those who were associated with him.

As a Member of the House our late colleague did not make it his business to speak upon every opportunity and upon every subject. Yet when he did speak he commanded the attention of his colleagues. He commanded the attention of his colleagues because he preferred to speak only upon subjects with which he was acquainted, because he had courage, and because he placed the great well-being of our country above the personal equation and above the aspiration and ambition of any local community or State.

As a public speaker Mr. LONGWORTH never could be classed as one of the old fervid type who indulged in rhetoric and word pictures; rather he belonged to the new type, to the type that is consistent with the practical man of affairs, the business man, the student, who is capable of translating his philosophy into the common everyday experience and language of the world; and it was because of this that he invited command and sustained his position in the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH came to the floor leadership of the Republicans in the House of Representatives at a time when the membership of his party was large and when conditions were right for possible schism within party ranks. How well Mr. LONGWORTH conducted himself as Republican floor leader can best be told by recalling that upon the completion of his services as leader of his party on the floor he was elevated to the high office of Speaker, where for three terms he served with great distinction and ability, and where under his leadership the House of Representatives came to occupy a plane of admiration and respect in the public mind that it had not occupied for a generation.

One of the fine virtues of man is loyalty. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH was loyal to his friends. He was loyal to principles. He was a partisan. It was natural for him to believe that his friends could not be wrong. He would go the limit for them. Even so, he was fair and just to his opponents; and as he retired from the Speakership of the House of Representatives he carried with him the good will of Republican and Democrat alike in the thought that he had performed the high office of Speaker faithfully, courteously, courageously, impartially, and that in the history of the Republic his name would be placed alongside of the names of the great Speakers of the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, probably every Member of the House of Representatives in the Seventy-first and immediately prior Congresses would wish to speak a word on the memory of the late Speaker, the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, of Ohio. His passing was so sudden, so unexpected, but withal so significant, that his friends are yet astounded and bewildered by the strange ways of a benign Providence. True, he spoke almost prophetically when he said at the closing of the Seventy-first Congress that the selection of a Speaker for the Seventy-second Congress lay in the laps of the gods, and that for the honors he had received he was "abundantly satisfied," but none of us expected those to be his last words in the Chamber of the House. We who recall him as a leading member of the Committee on Ways and Means, then as Republican floor leader, and then for six years as Speaker of the House, will never forget his kindly nature, his human sympathy, his clear and convincing diction, his power in debate, his clear understanding of parliamentary procedure, his comprehensive grasp of public questions, and his patriotic devotion to the welfare of the entire Nation. There was nothing personal, narrow, or sectional in his viewpoint or action in any matter of public concern. He was a man's man in his personal relations and a statesman of full stature in his public service. I hold him in high esteem and affectionate personal regard.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH greatly saddened our hearts and it is difficult to adequately express in words the affection in which he was held by the entire membership of this House—Democrats and Republicans alike.

Recognized as a great parliamentarian and presiding officer, his rulings and decisions were universally considered fair and impartial, and he deserves to be long remembered for his exceptional legislative work. He was true to the party with which he acted, but for his opponents he had no words of abuse and accorded them the same freedom of opinion he claimed for himself, and to them was always considerate.

In manner he was sociable and dignified; in conversation, entertaining; and while possessing qualities of the most positive character, his nature was so kindly and his disposition so courteous that he had fewer collisions in the many and divers kinds of legislation in which he took a most active part than fall to the lot of the most favored few. This positiveness of character led him not to fear antagonism, but his kindness of heart raised up friends and prevented life-long enmities.

In his service as Speaker he worked hard and incessantly, and it is more than probable that his close application to his public duties during the last trying session of Congress and his deep anxiety that all matters with which the country was concerned should go well so wore upon him and sapped his strength as to cause his premature end.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH has left in the House of Representatives no enemies; all who even knew him slightly were his friends. The country can ill afford to lose him, and it is a matter of universal regret that death prevented him from rendering many additional years of useful service to the Nation.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit the RECORD to close without a word for the memorial volume on the life and public services of the late Speaker NICHOLAS LONGWORTH. Others will tell of his many fine qualities of head and heart as well as of his deeds as a many-sided man and public servant. I shall try to describe but a single quality possessed by him which added greatly to his personal charm and which was the key to his unusual effectiveness as a legislator. If called upon to describe this quality in a single phrase, I should characterize it as the ability to cooperate. In social intercourse it enabled him to play not only any rôle assigned him but almost any other necessary to round out or make complete the joy and jollity of the party.

In his work as a legislator it was his most valuable asset, enabling him not only to use his own talents to the best advantage but also to greatly increase their effectiveness by adding to them the results of the cooperative efforts of others. My own impressions of LONGWORTH'S somewhat unique ability to cooperate successfully with others were gained through an experience of 20 years as a colleague, but particularly during the last 12 years of our service in the House of Representatives together.

I first met NICHOLAS LONGWORTH as a colleague at the extra session of the Sixty-first Congress in 1909. He was then a member of the great Ways and Means Committee, and, as President Taft had called us together to revise the tariff, I soon had opportunity to see him in action. During the next four years I came to know him and to love him, as did all who came near enough to him. He and I then had the common experience of being "lame ducks" together, of taking a 2-year furlough without pay during the Sixty-third Congress, and ultimately, along with Uncle Joe Cannon and a number of others, of being fellow "comebacks" in the Sixty-fourth Congress. He was restored to his old Committee on Ways and Means at once and I joined him on the committee at the beginning of the Sixty-sixth Congress, immediately following the Great War.

During the tariff revision of 1921 and 1922 LONGWORTH served as chairman of the subcommittee on the chemical schedule, while I presided over the metal and sundries schedules, and others over the other schedules, but there was the greatest possible necessity for cooperative effort in bringing all the schedules into proper adjustment for a well-balanced, completed tariff bill.

In the Sixty-eighth Congress the party majority had almost vanished. LONGWORTH was chosen majority leader and was enabled to "carry on" as such by his ability to utilize to the best advantage possible the support of his lean majority of party coworkers.

When he became Speaker at the beginning of the Sixty-ninth Congress I became majority leader, and for six years our labors together might be described as that of yokefellows. For the successful working out of a legislative program it is absolutely essential that the Speaker and the majority leader be able to work together in such accord that the result of their combined labors may be the unified judgment of both.

In this relationship no majority leader ever had a fairer or more just share of the inevitable responsibility than I had with NICK LONGWORTH. He was always willing to give and take. He always had ideas as to what was best to do as each emergency arose requiring a decision, but he never insisted upon having his own way unless he was able by logic and sound reasoning to convince others of the wisdom of his proposed solution of the problem.

I can imagine nothing more unsatisfactory or uncomfortable, and in the end nothing less conducive to the public interest, than a situation where the Speaker either contributes nothing to the solution of the problems arising or, on the other hand, where the Speaker attempts to completely dominate the House without regard to the views or judgment of the majority leader; for, after all, the majority leader is chosen by the party itself to direct the party program on the floor of the House. While properly jealous of the rights of the great office of Speaker, LONGWORTH was great enough in himself to properly recognize the position and responsibility of his party team mate and so cooperated with him as to give the House and the country the resultant benefit of their united, unified efforts.

The cooperative spirit of LONGWORTH went to the generous extent of being willing to assume his share of the responsibility and take his share of the resulting grief. Nor did he belong to that all too numerous class of individuals always willing to allow others to shoulder the burden of the work provided they themselves receive all the credit for the result.

No one had a better opportunity to know LONGWORTH in his work on Capitol Hill than I, and I measure my words in saying that as a fellow toiler in the legislative field, as a coworker in the Nation's business, as a yokefellow, willing to draw his share of the load, he was preeminent. By reason of this quality he secured results unattainable by others not inferior in ability but lacking this characteristic. By its use he used the ability of others joined with his own for the more effective service of the country he loved.

MATTHEW VINCENT O'MALLEY

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, although I was a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress, my service in the House has now passed the half-year mark in the Seventy-second Congress, but it is a completion of a fruitful and delightful six months of companionship and friendship, signalized by an opportunity for the greatest education that our country now affords to any American citizen.

When we assemble in this historic Hall to pay tribute to the memories of our departed colleagues, we fully realize the responsibilities and the duties that bring us here and the value of their association and services. At such a time we stand in the presence of a great mystery in which we are all eventually equal. High or low, rich or poor, millionaire or mendicant, king or subject, all must answer the same call to march through that grim and ghostly cordon beyond which we may well all meet when the sun goes down and the final day is done.

The Grim Reaper during the past few months has been active in our ranks, and to-day we assemble to honor the life, the achievements, and the memory of MATTHEW V.

O'MALLEY, a Representative from the great State of New York.

I shall find it difficult to enter this sanctuary during the remainder of my tenure of this great office without thinking of my friend who is gone.

There is a truism that "man proposes and God disposes." This is particularly true in the case of my late departed friend. For many years he cherished the ambition to sit in the Halls of Congress, only to be denied this privilege after being selected by the voters of the seventh congressional district of Brooklyn, N. Y., as their representative.

As boys, Matt and I played together. His chums were my chums; his friends were my friends. Our families visited one another. We grew up together. We met daily. Our friendship grew with the passing of time. A half century passed and we retained the same friendly feeling toward each other.

His dealings with his business and social acquaintances were beyond question. He was a friend in stormy weather. Few sought his aid who did not leave MATT O'MALLEY with his wishes gratified. MATT O'MALLEY was a kindly man. He loved to help the unfortunate. No charitable cause ever failed to enlist his ready sympathy. No one in trouble ever appealed to him in vain. It was this great spirit of helpfulness so characteristic of our dead colleague which united him with grips of steel to the people of his district regardless of party affiliation.

MATT O'MALLEY would have been an outstanding figure in any group into which he might have been thrown. In school he always played his part, whatever it might be, in such a manner as to distinguish himself and to make himself notable among his fellows. It was ever so throughout his life in whatever activity he might engage. He loved his native Brooklyn and New York with more than filial devotion. To the welfare of both he gave his manifold talents unstintedly and unsparingly. He cherished the lofty traditions and high ideals of Brooklyn and New York and lived up to them worthily. He was a student at the Parochial School of the Assumption and Public Schools No. 1 and No. 5.

His rise to place and distinction in this House would have been inevitable and be credited specially to two outstanding characteristics, each of these being the result of certain conspicuous qualities of mind and heart innate in his character.

I have spoken, as others will speak, of his attractive, pleasing personality. This inevitably brought and kept him many friends. The spirit of comradeship was his to a remarkable degree. His personal hold upon his friends added greatly to his effectiveness as a public servant. He made friends rapidly and retained them. The sad news of his sudden and untimely taking-off came as a shock to a host of friends who had learned to love and admire him with deep affection. In his death every one of his colleagues in this House and thousands of friends in every part of the Nation experienced a sense of personal loss. This was because to MATT O'MALLEY friendship was something more than a name. It was a passion and a virtue. It was a part of his very being.

I can recall one of his outstanding attributes, that of gratitude. In my conversations with him he often spoke of the dear father and mother who, at great personal sacrifice, gave him an opportunity to secure an education, and all during the years he said that the greatest thought he had was of the untiring zeal and devotion of that father and mother who had foregone everything to give him his chance. And, let it be to his credit, he embraced it.

Another of his characteristics, to my mind, was his loyalty—loyalty to his friends, loyalty to his city and State, and loyalty to his country. But above all he loved his country—no one loved her better—no one could do more for the men who fought in its behalf than he. No one thrilled more at the gallant achievements numbered in her glorious history.

To those who were near and dear to him by the ties of blood I feel that I can speak with some degree of appreciation, being one who is acquainted with grief and not unknown to sorrow along this line. In life he proved that it is not life that matters but that courage that we bring into it.

With the departure of Representative O'MALLEY, New York has lost a beloved son, the Nation a splendid public servant, and ending a career filled with usefulness, sincerity, and integrity; a man among men. We are not eulogizing him to-day, but testifying to his worth, ability, and honored citizenship.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I knew intimately well our late colleague MATTHEW V. O'MALLEY for many years. I learned to have an abiding affection for him. Death found him a shining mark.

Although it was not his privilege to reach the floor of the House, since death claimed him before the opening of the first session after his election, nevertheless he had the attributes that make for kindliness, wisdom, and willingness to serve. He would have made a Congressman of rare distinction.

He has now gone through the Valley of the Shadow to that undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns. There he dwells in a windowless palace of sleep; he now has surcease from trial and pain.

He will, however, have died in vain unless we, the living, honor him by emulating his example of piety and goodness.

No words can beguile his loved ones from their overpowering grief; only time can bring solace to their tortured spirits and balm to their wounded hearts; but they should take comfort in the thought that he leaves behind a good name. Well might we reecho the sentiment of the psalmist, who said:

> Better the fragrance of a good name than the perfume of precious oils.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed difficult to place our thoughts into language that will properly express our feelings toward departed friends.

The individuals who stand out in prominence the world over are the ones whose honesty and simplicity first attract you and whose ability to perform their tasks afterwards impresses you. Words of praise can be used in the description of anybody who has ceased to exist, but truthful words describing a character that had to do with all of the different phases of human nature and came through without a scar are, indeed, the exception. This I can justly say of my departed friend MATT O'MALLEY.

MATT O'MALLEY was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and attended the public and parochial schools of that borough. He was elected to the Seventy-second Congress and represented the seventh New York congressional district in the House of Representatives. The good Lord, in His infinite wisdom, decreed to take him unto Himself before he ever took his seat in the Congress. I deeply regret that he was not spared to take his seat, for, in my humble opinion, he would have been an outstanding figure in Congress.

MATT O'MALLEY was a lovable character. He was first a good citizen, a real Democrat, and a stanch and loyal party man, who, from his humble beginning, attained all of the honors during a period of years that his people could give him.

His home life was ideal. His business and political life was security itself, because he fairly breathed honesty, loyalty, and integrity of purpose. To his friends he was as pure gold. No one ever knew MATT O'MALLEY to shirk an obligation. He was quiet and unassuming, his disposition genial and sunny, his companionship delightful, and his efforts to serve untiring.

Of a deep religious nature, MATT O'MALLEY's private life was at once an example and an inspiration to all who enjoyed the privilege of his acquaintance and friendship. His home life was the gage by which the Nation's domestic bliss and faithfulness might be measured. His daily life was a sermon as powerful as any ever preached from a pulpit.

We treasure our recollection of him. We are sad because he was taken from us, but we fervently thank God for having given him to us.

I along with many other Members of Congress attended his funeral services at the Church of the Assumption, Brooklyn, N. Y., and I was profoundly impressed by the sincere evidence of genuine sorrow, love, and respect manifested by the vast throng who assembled there to honor him on that solemn occasion, representing as they did every phase and walk of life of the borough of Brooklyn in whose life he played such a useful and important part.

And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread,
For all the boundless universe is life;
There are no dead.

CHARLES ANTHONY MOONEY

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of Memorial Day, 1931, CHARLES A. MOONEY, who represented the twentieth congressional district of Ohio in the Congress of the United States, passed to his eternal reward. As one who succeeded him, I consider it an honor and a privilege to have this opportunity to pay a tribute to his memory.

Enjoying his friendship for many years before and during his public career, I became impressed with the tolerance, candor, and sincerity of one who was to all who knew him the soul of honor. Born in St. Marys, Ohio, January 15, 1879, he was educated and grew to manhood in his native city. He came to the metropolis of Ohio in 1911. During the years 1915 to 1919 he served with credit and distinction in the Senate of the State of Ohio. He was first elected to the Sixty-sixth Congress of the United States, and subsequently reelected to the Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, and Seventy-first Congresses.

Within the confines of the twentieth congressional district of Ohio there is certainly more tangible wealth than in any other district in the State. The palaces of the rich and the hovels of the poor abound therein in numbers. Practically every race on God's earth resides within its boundaries. It is a truly cosmopolitan district representing the various racial groups that comprise the composite American. CHARLES A. MOONEY knew his people and they knew him. His constituents, irrespective of political or religious belief, trusted him and came to love and respect him.

He was the friend of the poor immigrant and spent his strength incessantly in his behalf. He made especial effort to reunite the loved ones of sea-divided families, when that was possible by law or regulation. He was a strong believer in social justice for the poor and downtrodden. He had a sense of responsibility to his constituents and to the Nation as a whole. His every official act reflected conscientious effort and application to duty. He despised sham, pretense, and hypocrisy, and he never affected ostentation. Possessing a knowledge of the frailties of human nature, his ears were never attuned to the tongues of gossip or slander. He was never known to utter an unkind word of his fellow men. The congressional committee who attended his funeral will ever remember the crowd within and around St. John's Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio, who came to register their respect and sorrow for their Congressman and friend.

CHARLES A. MOONEY possessed a virtue much too rare in these days of selfishness and materialism, a virtue which is beautifully epitomized by a poet of his race, the immortal John Boyle O'Reilly, in his poem called—

WHAT IS GOOD?

What is the real good?
I asked in musing mood.

Order, said the law court;
Knowledge, said the school;
Truth, said the wise man;
Pleasure, said the fool;
Love, said the maiden;
Beauty, said the page;
Freedom, said the dreamer;
Home, said the sage;
Fame, said the soldier;
Equity, the seer.
Spake my heart full sadly,
"The answer is not here."

Then within my bosom
Softly this I heard:
"Each heart holds the secret;
Kindness is the word."

His kindness and tolerance endeared him to his colleagues in Congress and to all those who came in contact with him. "Kind in word and deed" sums up the character of this distinguished son of the Buckeye State.

His was an ideal family life. He lived for and worshiped his good wife and splendid children. He was a true husband, father, and companion. There is a void in that loving family circle that can not be filled, but he has left them a garland of memories that will never fade and which will furnish the consolation necessary to lessen their grief with the passing of time.

May his soul and the souls of the faithful departed through the mercy of God rest in peace.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, the ceremonies to-day, impressive in their simplicity and sincerity, are for the purpose of paying tribute to our departed colleagues. The all too long list, which has been read, states briefly and concisely the service which each of them has given to his country. It is impressive in its variety. It is a story of devotion to public service and a record of achievement, a fitting tribute to the public careers of our comrades.

Among those names stands that of CHARLES A. MOONEY, whose record of many years of public service, both in his State and in the Halls of Congress, evidences the appreciation in which he was held. He, like others, had a record of achievement and advancement in Congress, illustrating the cooperation and respect of his colleagues. And he, like others, has a record of a host of friends, both in public and private life, which, best of all, indicates the affection his nature inspired and the underlying sterling principles which made his life what it was.

Others will speak of the intimate details of the life of CHARLES MOONEY, his birth, his education, the responsibilities which came to him during his advancement in life, and matters pertaining to his private and political career. My words are offered as a brief but sincere tribute to a friendship which grew and ripened during our comparatively short service together in Washington.

Although members of opposite political parties, my regard for him began in Cleveland, where he represented the twentieth Ohio district so understandingly that he carried the good will of a large majority of Republican and Democratic constituents alike. During my first days in Congress his fine understanding of service to his community was peculiarly evident in his readiness to cooperate in all matters relating to our great city of Cleveland, and my appreciation of his sympathetic helpfulness rapidly grew into a friendship I shall always treasure.

Although separated from me by the center aisle, his suggestions and counsel on legislation affecting the welfare and activities of the citizens of his city and State indicated his keen interest in and understanding of the welfare of his fellows. As a fellow member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee his advice and untiring efforts on projects affecting the interests of Cleveland gave ample proof of his belief and sincerity in that field of Government activities. In fact, he was one of those most jealous of the interests of the Great Lakes on that committee and gave most freely of his time in their behalf.

In the affairs of his district he displayed that same ability, was conscientious in the discharge of his public duty, and true to his convictions, enjoying the confidence and respect of both sides of the House.

In his family and religious life he showed those same qualities of devotion and faithfulness of purpose which governed his daily actions.

It was my privilege to be present at the impressive services held in the great Catholic Cathedral in Cleveland, where the host of men and women present expressed their love and sorrow for their departed friend. The bishop of the diocese, speaking of our colleague's life, showed full well his understanding of the man and the need of him and his kind in these times when he finished his stirring and beautiful eulogy with the familiar and inspiring words of J. G. Holland:

God give us men. The time demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ruling hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not die;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog,
In public duty and in private thinking!
For while the rabble with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds
Mingle in selfish strife; Lo! freedom weeps!
Wrong rules the land, and waiting justice sleeps!

There is little I can add to the words of tribute expressed by others. My appreciation of CHARLEY MOONEY'S ability, his genial, buoyant nature, his love of his fellows, and his understanding of their problems is probably only what all have sensed. In his passing we have lost a tried and lovable companion, Cleveland a valued and trusted citizen, and many of us a real friend. And yet, in the knowledge of that loss is there not a feeling of deep gratitude and appreciation that we have been privileged to have known such a man?

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the late Congressman CHARLES A. MOONEY was not only my colleague but it was my good fortune that we were intimate friends. Mr. MOONEY was one of those whose friends were legion. He often said to me that he liked "people," and I know that he had almost a passion for friendship.

Anyone who was fortunate enough to know Mr. MOONEY intimately recognized the fact that he was a man of honor. I served with him in Congress eight years, and I know how scrupulous he was at all times to avoid even the appearance of anything dishonorable in his official conduct.

He was always delighting in rendering service to individual constituents, and even to those who were not his constituents.

He had a great desire to see a higher degree of justice established in the world than now prevails, and you could always count on Mr. MOONEY'S support of measures which he believed looked to that end.

In his official work Mr. MOONEY recognized the fact that nowadays the effective work is done in the committee room, and, accordingly, he was not disposed to speak often or at length on the floor of the House. He could always be counted upon, however, to do most effective work in his committee. There he presented his views forcefully and yet in a most tactful way, thereby assuring the greatest possible benefits to those whom it was his privilege to represent.

In brief, Mr. MOONEY was faithful to his duties and a devoted friend, and he was not a mere "fair-weather" friend. Often I have heard some friend of his severely criticized and even condemned by everyone else in the company of which Mr. MOONEY happened for the moment to be a party, and almost invariably I have heard him promptly defend and justify the friend in question.

During the last year of his life I had occasion to quote to Mr. MOONEY a few lines of poetry written by Ernest Crosby. He said that it was his favorite quotation and represented his highest conception of a worthy life. Because the lines seemed to express his idea of true manhood, I here quote them, as follows:

LIFE AND DEATH

So he died for his faith. That is fine—
More than most of us do.
But stay, can you add to that line
That he lived for it, too?

In his death he bore witness at last
As a martyr to truth.
Did his life do the same in the past,
From the days of his youth?

It is easy to die. Men have died
For a wish or a whim—
From bravado or passion or pride.
Was it harder for him?

But to live: every day to live out
All the truth that he dreamt,
While his friends met his conduct with doubt
And the world with contempt.

Was it thus that he plodded ahead,
Never turning aside?
Then we'll talk of the life that he led—
Never mind how he died.

GEORGE S. GRAHAM

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, the death of Hon. GEORGE S. GRAHAM on July 4, 1931, marked the passing of another distinguished son of Pennsylvania, a noted statesman, a prominent lawyer, and a faithful public servant.

For more than 50 years GEORGE GRAHAM had taken an active part in civic affairs of the city of Philadelphia, where he was honored and respected by everyone.

At the age of 27 he was elected a member of our select council, and thereafter for 18 years, from 1880 to 1898, he served as district attorney of Philadelphia. It was in this capacity that he first achieved fame, and he will always rank as the most outstanding and talented of our prosecuting attorneys. After serving as professor of criminal law and procedure in the law school of the University of Pennsylvania for 11 years, he was again called to the public service by election to Congress.

He came to the Sixty-third Congress with a rich experience, an unusual training, and fully conversant with the needs of the Nation, and soon developed into one of the most dependable, energetic, and useful Members of the House. His great wealth of information, his profound knowledge of legal principles, his strong and logical intellect and superb powers for the presentation of his views gave him unusual advantage in the discussion and consideration of problems of national import. He had pronounced views upon all great public questions, and always had the courage to express them. He was a forceful speaker and ready debater, but fearless, honest, and straightforward.

My acquaintance with Mr. GRAHAM was formed years before he or I gave thought to the opportunity of serving in Congress. I have always held him in the highest esteem and admired him for his unusual legal talents, his exceptional ability, and sound judgment, as well as his sincere and determined advocacy of the principles of the Republican Party. I am happy to have had the privilege and opportunity of serving in Congress with him. We labored in perfect harmony, and our associations were most pleasant. He was a most kindly and courteous gentleman.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution adopted by the Committee on the Judiciary:

The Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives has heard with profound sorrow of the death of its distinguished chairman and beloved colleague, GEORGE SCOTT GRAHAM, of Pennsylvania, on July 4, 1931.

GEORGE SCOTT GRAHAM served as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives from the Sixty-third Congress to the Sixty-seventh Congress, and as chairman of the committee from the Sixty-eighth Congress until the end of the Seventy-first Congress.

The members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives desire to express their great sense of personal loss in the death of GEORGE SCOTT GRAHAM, whose passing removed from their councils and the council chambers of the Nation a wise, learned, and patriotic statesman and leader.

GEORGE SCOTT GRAHAM'S services as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and as its chairman were marked by his devotion to the Constitution of the United States as adopted by our forefathers, of which he was always a ready and able defender, his loyalty to the courts of the United States and the preservation of their powers and integrity, his interest and sympathy with progressive workmen's compensation legislation and with legislation providing for enlightened treatment and care of Federal prisoners. As chairman of the committee, he gave unstintedly of his time and, in a manner in keeping with the training and experience which he had gained from a long, distinguished career at the bar, thoroughly prepared himself as to every detail of legislation which received the attention of the committee. He presided over the committee with fairness and conducted its proceedings with becoming dignity. Participating in the committee's deliberations, he was ever a tactful, gracious, and enlightened counselor and arbiter. His loyalty and affections for the committee were manifested by his desire to secure unanimity of action upon the measures reported to the House, and in this respect his modesty in expressing his own views and gentlemanly consideration of the views of those of his colleagues who might differ with him brought him a high degree of success.

Be it therefore resolved, That the members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives do hereby express their profound sorrow and sense of deep personal loss in the death of their former colleague and chairman, GEORGE SCOTT GRAHAM, and that a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this committee and a copy be sent to the members of the family of the deceased.

Adopted February 23, 1932.

Attest: JOHN W. GIRVIN, Clerk.

CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, as we turn aside to-day from our usual and customary duties to pay tribute to our departed comrades, I feel greatly depressed when I think of the magnitude of the loss that has come to the people whom I have the honor to represent in this body in the passing of my distinguished predecessor the lamented and beloved CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS, who so ably represented the first congressional district of Georgia in the House of Representatives for more than 16 years.

I knew Mr. EDWARDS for more than a quarter of a century, and, like all others who knew him, I looked upon him as a friend. He was born in Tattnall County, while I was born across the river in Appling. His devoted wife, who before her marriage was Miss Ora Beach, also first saw the light of day in Appling County. Her parents and my parents were friends early in life. My mother lived in the Beach home about the time of the birth of Mrs. Edwards. My father met my mother and became engaged to her while she was living in the Beach home. Friendships sprang up between the families that grew with time and that can never be obliterated.

CHARLEY EDWARDS was given every opportunity that his substantial parents could provide for him. He was encouraged to take advantage of the opportunities afforded him at home, and after he had finished high school he attended Gordon Institute at Barnesville, Ga. Later he attended the Florida State College and finally graduated from the law department of the University of Georgia. He first practiced law in Reidsville, the county seat of the county of his birth. After practicing law for a few years he moved his office to Savannah, Ga., believing that the opportunities that would present themselves to him in the larger city would be greater in number.

He was first elected to Congress in 1906. Hon. J. A. Brannen, of Statesboro, and Hon. Walter W. Sheppard, of Savannah, had been the candidates for the Democratic nomination in the primary held that year, the result of which was a deadlocked convention. Each of the candidates had 18 of the 36 county unit votes, but neither could secure the nomination. Finally, after the convention had been in session for approximately 60 days and had balloted more than 800 times, Mr. EDWARDS was nominated as the representative of the convention, and he continued to serve the people of the first district as their Representative in Congress for five successive Congresses. After having served his people in this capacity for 10 years, he voluntarily retired from public life. In 1924 he again became a candidate for the office and was elected. He was reelected in 1926, in 1928, and in 1930. He was never defeated for the office.

Mr. EDWARDS was a tireless worker. No constituency was ever better represented than were the people of the first congressional district of Georgia during the time that they were represented by him. He has often been referred to by his people as "the man of effort." In his efforts he was usually successful. He accomplished a great many things for the people of his district. His experience, gained by the time that he spent in Washington and his friendly contacts with other Members of Congress, made it possible for him to do many things for Georgia and Georgians that an inexperienced man could not have accomplished. Almost everyone who knew Mr. EDWARDS as the Representative of Georgia's first district in Congress knew about the magnificent work that he did while a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of this body. There was a time when he had seen more service on this committee than any other Democratic Member of the House, and he was therefore at that time the ranking Democratic member of this great and important committee. Georgia was always able to receive the consideration due her from the Rivers and Harbors Committee, mainly on account of the prestige and influence he had with his associates on this committee.

There is a feature of CHARLEY EDWARDS'S service that few people know anything about. When he returned to Congress for his second long tour of duty in 1925, Mr. EDWARDS became a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. He soon learned that a great deal of favoritism was being shown in the Foreign Service to the wealthy, the influential, and those who could demand the assistance of skilled politicians. He set himself to work to correct this deplorable situation. Always the champion of the masses and the common people, who have few representatives who will interest themselves in them, he worked as faithfully in his efforts to reorganize and improve the Foreign Service of the United States as he did in his other work for the people of his district. He was instrumental in having carried into effect the provisions of the Rogers bill, an act that reorganized and improved conditions in the Foreign Service. If Mr. EDWARDS had rendered no service to his country other than that for which he is given credit as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House of Representatives, his public service would not have been in vain.

In evaluating the patriotic service that CHARLEY EDWARDS rendered to his country, there is one record of his achievements that is not to be found on the statute books of the Nation, nor is it contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the archives of the country do not disclose its existence. The enduring record of the fidelity and devotion to duty of CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS is to be found engraved in the hearts of the constituents whom he so faithfully and efficiently served. Many measures are enacted into law, accomplish their purpose, and pass into the realm of things that are forgotten, but the memory of CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS will not be so ephemeral. In the hearts of the citizens of the first district of Georgia, where he was born and reared and where he served for such a long period of time, is to be found a monument to my predecessor in office that will outlive any physical monument that might be erected to the memory of the departed great.

In village, town, and hamlet, and along the far-flung farms of the countryside are to be found rich and poor, old and young, humble and distinguished who recognized in CHARLES G. EDWARDS a faithful friend. It is only on the rarest of occasions that a constituency is so fortunate in having a Representative so devoted to their interests and to his duty as was this late-lamented comrade. His friendship for his constituents was not confined to his campaigns nor to the effort to secure advancement for himself. CHARLEY EDWARDS was a public servant whose interest in his constituents transcended any official capacity and extended to their personal well-being. Such devotion to constituents and friends could not escape reward, and the many times that Mr. EDWARDS was returned to serve in this distinguished body is mute evidence of the esteem in which his people held him. Many of you who were his colleagues here know of his efficient efforts in the House. Many of you are familiar with the conscientious manner in which he attended to the affairs of the Nation, his State, and his district; but only those who are familiar with his constituency and with the efforts and ambitions of the people whom he served can fully appreciate the sincere and faithful manner in which he brought to fulfillment his dynamic ideal of service to the common people.

It is an understatement to say that CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS was a faithful public servant, for the scope of his activity far exceeded the bounds of efficient official duty, no matter how broadly they may be interpreted. Only a man in whose heart blossomed the flower of human sympathy and understanding could render a stewardship so gratifying to the people whom he represented and loved. This patriot, who only a few months since passed on to his glorious reward, was more than a Congressman, more than a public official, and more than a statesman. In deed and in truth, this man was a friend to man. No doubt he approached as nearly as does any other one individual of his time the ideal of the teachings of the Master when He said, "But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which spitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven." In reality CHARLEY EDWARDS was a child of God.

There are times when we are brought to realize the futility of words in expressing an emotion that transcends the common things of life and places humanity on a higher plane than that on which most mortals move. This is especially true as I attempt at this time to evaluate the services that CHARLEY EDWARDS rendered to the people of the first congressional district of Georgia. Words can but poorly express the feelings that his friends have in looking back upon his career. The record of the jewels of thought that he contributed to the counsels of the Nation are to be found in the archives and a monument will mark the last resting place of his mortal body, but it is in the hearts of his people that the memory of CHARLEY EDWARDS lives on and on and in this most sacred manner that his memory will go forward on down through the centuries. To paraphrase:

He shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, he knew not where;
He breathed a song into the air,
It fell to earth, he knew not where;
Long afterward, in an oak,
He found the arrow still unbroke
And the song, from beginning to end,
He found again in the heart of a friend.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I knew CHARLEY EDWARDS all his life and I loved him. We were both born in old Tattnall, now Evans County, Ga., just a few years apart. He was a member of a very substantial family and grew up in an atmosphere of character and refinement. He attended Gordon Institute, at Barnesville; Florida State College; and was graduated from the law department of the University of Georgia. His first location for the practice of law was at Reidsville, but he soon moved to Savannah, and when a very young man entered the field of politics. His political career can accurately be termed a stormy one, but he was unusually successful despite many obstacles. He was elected to the Sixtieth and the four succeeding Congresses, and voluntarily retired to resume the practice of law. He was again elected to the Sixty-ninth Congress and served continuously until his sudden death in July, 1931.

Charley was genial, affable, and cordial in manner. He had the faculty of making friends and holding them. This faculty took a wide range among all classes of people. I doubt if any man ever possessed this faculty to a greater degree than did CHARLEY EDWARDS. I never saw him depressed and I never heard him utter a single expression of despair. He thought well of his fellow Members. He was passionately devoted to his country. He cherished a divine hope of the future. No utterance of his on this floor could be classed as demagogic. He spoke his convictions and he voted them. He was no opportunist, no timeserver. He was a man of courage, of conviction, tender-hearted, and a true friend. He was a fond and devoted husband, and his love for his only son, Charles Beach, was one among the many beautiful characteristics of his life. If ever there was a true, loyal, and honest soul, it was in the bosom of CHARLEY EDWARDS. I miss him, but I seek some consolation in the following verses from the Psalm of Life:

Tell me not in mournful numbers
Life is but an empty dream,
For the soul is dead that slumbers,
And things are not what they seem.

Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal:
"Dust thou art, to dust returnest"
Was not spoken of the soul.

Charley still lives in memory of his many friends, in the hearts of his countrymen, and I am sure in restful peace in the world beyond.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, the death of my friend and former colleague CHARLES G. EDWARDS occurred from a heart ailment last July while he was seated in my office in Atlanta, engaged in conversation with myself and our colleague Mr. WRIGHT. The manner of his passing and its suddenness were, of course, a great shock.

It is always a sad experience to lose a dear friend. To have his death occur suddenly and in your presence is most distressing. To see the life of a beloved associate ebbing away while you are helpless to stop it is an experience that I will never forget.

It was my good fortune to know CHARLES G. EDWARDS for many years. When I came to Washington as a clerk in 1911, he was a Member of the House. While I was an employee of the House, he was kind to me and always friendly. That was his natural disposition.

When I returned to Washington in 1929 to become his colleague, he befriended me in every way possible. He was always ready to advise and help me with any problem. He was of great assistance to me in becoming familiar with my new duties, and often gave me counsel that was of great value.

Mr. EDWARDS was a true friend, a loyal and conscientious worker for the general welfare of our great Nation, and a tireless servant of his constituents. He was a devoted father and husband, a man who was devoted to his friends, and whose friends were countless. True to his convictions, he was, nevertheless, considerate and tolerant of others who might differ with him.

In his death Congress lost a valued Member, the Nation and his district lost a servant who always was true to the public trust, and I have sustained the loss of a true and beloved friend. My heart is filled with sympathy for the loved ones he left behind.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, when I came to the Sixty-fifth Congress CHARLEY EDWARDS was retiring voluntarily after a successful career in the House. He won my admiration during the few days I was acquainted with him before leaving, and this contact ripened into a real friendship upon his return to the House as a Representative from his great State of Georgia.

Congressman EDWARDS was a wide-awake and useful Member of this body and served his State with honor and distinction. He had that rare virtue of loyalty to friendship. When he was your friend, it was for all times and not just for the occasion. He set a fine example for his splendid son, for whom he had an indescribable affection.

He was an indulgent husband and was never happier than when in the company of his faithful companion.

Nothing can take away the pang that we feel in separating from those we love. The more intense our love the more trying the final separation. But a life well spent and love in life requited is a balm for the broken heart.

Those whom the death of our friend touched most closely will not cease to lament their loss; but to recount his virtues will ever be a compensating pleasure. They gave to death what was mortal; they have with them the essence of his being, that which is immortal.

Hon. CHARLES G. EDWARDS was a gentleman of the highest type and his going was a great loss to his State and Nation.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the ability, character, and faithfulness which made CHARLEY EDWARDS impregnable in politics among the people of his district deeply endeared him to all others who knew him well and who had opportunity to appraise the qualities of the man.

As a member of the great Committee on Rivers and Harbors, he did effective work not only for Georgia but for the entire South. Nor was he sectional in his endeavors. Throughout his long period of service in the House of Representatives, he demonstrated the fact that he regarded himself as a representative of all the people of the Nation. He had a mind national in caliber, capable of visualizing and properly appraising great national problems. I shall never forget an occasion on the floor of the House when a Representative from one of the Eastern States made some remark intended as a reflection upon Georgia. Mr. EDWARDS immediately arose and, securing recognition from the Chair, not only defended Georgia from the unjust attack but scathingly indicted all efforts to inject sectional differences and prejudices into discussions affecting the decision of national questions. That expression was representative of his entire career, which was one of faithful service not to a State or section only, but to an entire people.

The members of the Georgia delegation found in him a tower of strength in every worthy endeavor. He apparently got more pleasure out of aiding a colleague than out of accomplishing something for himself. Those of us who came to Congress during his incumbency will never forget the many kindnesses that he showered upon us.

His sudden death in July of last year was a tremendous shock not only to all of Georgia but to all of official Washington, who knew, loved, and respected him. He passed as he would have wished, not after long and distressing illness, but quietly and quickly,

> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in the city of Atlanta, Ga., on the 13th day of July, 1931, our beloved CHARLEY EDWARDS was called from his hosts of earthly friends to another and better world. There never lived a sweeter, friendlier man, nor one who loved his God and his fellow men more than he, and there is no question but that he is at rest in his heavenly home. His life and character are worthy of emulation.

Congressman EDWARD's father was a soldier under Gen. Joseph Wheeler in the War between the States, and his youth was nourished with fine traditions and highly cultured environment. Nevertheless, he was a real boy, slow to wrath and loving peace, but sometimes kindling to a righteous indignation. He dearly loved the woods and wild life. He also played the violin in his youth, and frequently while in Congress he would go out into his district and play the "fiddle," as he called it, for his country-folk dances. He wanted to always save and perpetuate the institutions and customs which the American people had acquired and approved in long centuries of conscientious and intelligent experiment. He was always in demand as a teacher in the various Bible classes in his district, as he was known as a profound Bible student. The last time he addressed a gathering of church people was in the Bull Street Baptist Church on Mother's Day, 1931. The 2,000 people who crowded the auditorium to hear him testified that it was a beautiful tribute he paid, in his eloquent way, to mothers.

It was characteristic of him that he was always in a good humor, and from the lips of his secretary for 21 years I learn that he never once in all that time came down to his office "with a grouch on." He was always considerate of his employee, treating him more like a member of the family than as a paid employee.

When he came to Congress at the early age of 28, he was always early at his office; and one day, while his secretary was out, the Congressman was pegging away at one of the typewriters—and he had good speed thereon when you consider he used only three fingers—when an elderly Congressman passed by his office and stopped and told him if he ever wanted to leave his Congressman, he could find a place for him in his office. Mr. EDWARDS appreciated this very, very much.

We are told that all pain, sickness, weariness, distress, and agony of body are to be treated reverently. Every sorrow is a billow in the world's troublous sea, which we must pass over on the cross to bear us nearer home. The cloud forms, drops its rain, and passes away for the sun to shine and the flower to bloom. The storm gathers, purifies the air, and passes away for the fragrant and healthful calm to settle like a benediction on the land. Affliction comes and passes away for peace, joy, and glory to appear. When one passes under the shadow of the Cross of Calvary he knows that through this shadow lies the passage to the great white throne.

CHARLEY EDWARDS was a loyal man. He was loyal to his family, and a beautiful affection bound that small but sacred circle. He was loyal to duty. He was loyal to his State. He was proud of the honor that had been conferred upon him. He did all that he could to measure up to his responsibilities and he measured well. He was of gentle spirit, tender in heart. One of his greatest joys was in being of service to his fellow man. His deeds of kindness and his lovely character and personality caused a bond to be woven between him and his constituency that was never broken.

His campaign speeches were based on truth, candor, and absence of self-laudation, and a sincere interest in the public welfare was manifest in every utterance of his plain, honest speech. He was free of demagogy. He would never deceive or mislead anyone for any cause or end. The first district of Georgia realized that he was a devoted and most valued servant in the Congress, for he "came out from among them," knew their needs, felt their impulses, shared their difficulties, bore with them their burdens, and rejoiced with them in their successes. In their churches and schools he was their faithful helper.

In his death a splendid, useful, noble life came to a lamented end. As the forest puts on its brightest robe to die in, so does such a life robe itself in its tints of eternal beauty as its last hour approaches. When we think of CHARLEY EDWARDS, we recall the saying of the sweet Bard of Avon:

> His life was gentle, and the elements so mix'd in him
> That nature might stand up, and say to all the world,
> This was a man

Because of their great beauty and eminent fitness, I am incorporating herein the remarks delivered upon the occasion of Congressman EDWARDS's funeral by Rev. John S. Wilder, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Savannah, Ga., than whom no more able or more beloved Christian leader ever lived:

[Savannah Evening Press of July 15, 1931]

The greatness of Congressman CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS is found in the simplicity of his life. From the farm to the Congressional Halls he was ever the same. No position of prosperity ever changed his disposition toward his duty or his constituency.

Another characteristic of his life was his approachableness. No man so poor or so rich that he was denied an audience. No matter was too small or too great that did not have his undivided and patient attention.

He lived a sacrificial life. His unbounded loyalty to duty, his constant and untiring efforts for his people sent him to an early and untimely death. He gave his life for others, never considering himself in the great task of the upbuilding and betterment of his people and the community which he so ably represented for a quarter of a century, most of this time as our honored and beloved Congressman of the first district of Georgia.

Savannah, Chatham County, the first district, and the State of Georgia have sustained a loss which will not be easy to replace. No man of modern times has worked harder or fought longer or given more of his time, talent, and strength for the development of our community than he.

He was a real politician. He set an example in politics which may well be emulated by those who may engage in future governmental affairs. He was clean and upright, wise and judicious in all of his elections. He was fair and honest with his opponents. His life was devoid of the usual invectives and mud slinging. Ever and anon he fought vigorously, but always upon a high plane; issues and not men were his forte. He was a man of unquestionable integrity and lived, as he died, with a clear conscience.

He was a Christian gentleman. Although busy daily with the arduous duties of his high office, he found time to attend his church and worship God. During my intimacy with him in the last years of his life, I discovered in him that keen sense of nobility which characterizes the children of God.

He was a real man. The world loves a real man, and Congressman EDWARDS won that love and retained it to his death day.

No man can retain the love and confidence of a community over a period of half his life without having the qualities of a real man existing in him.

His interest in young men remains unquestioned. He fathered many young men, assisting them with his means and advice, and those young men live to bear testimony to his golden character.

He was a real, genuine friend. In the innermost recesses of his soul there was hidden a spring of true friendship, which flowed generously into the hearts of his fellow men. His heart was filled with the confidence of those who approached him. This characteristic is manifested by his constant reference to that beautiful poem of Sam Walter Foss, The House by the Side of the Road.

He was a devoted husband and father. His private and home life was one of joy and supreme happiness. His mind and heart were ever centered upon those who were near and dear to him by ties of kinship.

We shall miss him; but, thank God, our loss is his gain. He has gone home to receive his eternal reward, and God grant that on that great and eternal day we shall all meet him again beyond the silent river in that city where death and separation will be known no more.

CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS will never die; he will live on in the impulses of the unborn generations and, his name having been registered with the blessed of the earth, will never perish. God says, "The memory of the just is blessed; but the name of the wicked shall rot."

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I had heard and known of the conspicuous services of the Hon. CHARLES G. EDWARDS, of Georgia, long before I was elected to the United States House of Representatives in 1924. After coming here we represented adjoining districts on the Savannah River, and, therefore, had many problems of local interest in common. He was my senior in legislative experience by 10 or 12 years, and I was greatly pleased when I found him taking a keen personal interest in the problems of my district. I soon learned to call upon him for suggestions and advice, for it was one of the outstanding characteristics of his life to be of service to his friends. He made special efforts to assist whenever possible, and I was not long in learning to appreciate his interest and to recognize the value of his judgment in legislative matters.

It was his good fortune in early life to learn that success in any vocation is contingent upon hard work and conscientious discharge of duty. He acquired the habit of both in his youth, and they proved to be great factors in making him an unusually successful Member of Congress. He was not content to be a follower in legislative matters. He was constructive in his ideas and was always found taking the initiative in legislation he thought to be for the betterment of the people he represented and the country at large. There was no interest in his district that did not receive the full measure of his consideration and efforts.

While he lived in the largest city of his district and was very active in promoting the river and harbor activities of his home city—Savannah, Ga.—he never lost sight of the environment of his youth and the problems of his rural constituency. As a matter of fact, if there were any difference in the degree of consideration shown to the problems of the commercial and agricultural activities of his district, I think he would have preferred to emphasize the problems of rural life. For many years he labored both in season and out of season to secure the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River to afford greater opportunities to the people in Effingham, Screven, and adjoining counties in Georgia and those living across the river in Allendale, Barnwell, Bamberg, and adjoining counties in South Carolina.

It was through his untiring and energetic efforts that we finally succeeded in securing the passage of a bill through Congress giving the States of Georgia and South Carolina the right to construct such a bridge. He had given considerable attention to this project before I was elected to Congress and took the initiative afterwards, but upon the passage of the act referred to he was so generous and unselfish that in his public utterances he never claimed credit for more than having assisted in the matter. In reality, he should be credited with having originated the idea and contributed more toward its success than any other one person. I refer to this to illustrate an outstanding, unselfish characteristic in his life, a virtue not often found among men in public life, for they usually claim credit for all they do.

He attained one of his greatest political aspirations when he became a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee in the last Congress; and there is no doubt, if he had been spared, that his ability and leadership would have been abundantly recognized as opportunities arose in this new field of legislative experience.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the true representative in Congress is he who thinks the thoughts of his people, is in thorough sympathy with their every need, lives their very lives, is the embodiment of all that is highest and best in them, and loves them with a devotion that makes a benediction of the hardest labor in their behalf. Measured by this standard, Congressman EDWARDS was truly a representative of the people who gladly honored him so often and so greatly.

He was acquainted with, understood fully, and was in deepest sympathy with the whole range of human passion and endeavor from the heartaches of the poorest and humblest to the greatest and most exalted. It was not necessary for him to make inquiry of his people in order to vote or act for their best interest. Being of them, his every impulse was for their interest, and yet he "listened alike to the stars and birds, to babes and sages, with open heart." He always looked for the best in others and gave them the best he had. He lived much because he loved much. He loved the beautiful in nature and art; he loved birds, trees, flowers. He loved his fellows. He lived the best of all lives, a life of love and of service—the service that has the diviner attributes of forgetfulness of self and service to others.

Mr. EDWARDS was a most valuable Member of the House. He not only served well his district but rendered most splendid service to the whole Nation. For many years I recognized this to the fullest extent, and during an address on the 8th day of May, 1930, on the floor of the House I said:

> While giving credit to those who helped in the passage of the recent river and harbor bill, and thus rendered such splendid service to Georgia, the entire Atlantic seaboard, and the Nation, I again and again recall the faithful, thoughtful, and efficient service of my good friend and colleague from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS]. I know many of my items, as well as many items from New York to Key West, would not have been included in the bill except for his untiring, faithful service; and not only Georgia but the entire Nation is to be congratulated upon the decision of Mr. EDWARDS to again go upon the Rivers and Harbors Committee and take up anew his splendid work where he served so efficiently and helpfully several years ago.

After Mr. EDWARDS's death I succeeded him on the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and realize more fully than ever the great service he rendered on this vitally important committee. In every particular he measured up to the highest standard of a noble man and a true representative of a most splendid people.

It is so sad for a man so well equipped and so true to the highest and noblest ideals of his people to die so young, when his splendid training and innate honesty are so much needed in the solution of the mighty problems of the present.

It seemed that his work was just begun. There was so much more he wanted to do. He had so many noble plans when he was called.

The plans, details, and specifications were on the trestle board, the working tools were on every hand and ready, the machinery was being installed as the master builder was called to a higher and better, everlasting service and mission. And yet, Mr. Speaker, none of the splendid service of CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS is lost. God gathers up and saves for all humanity through all eternity the golden grains of such greatness and nobleness.

Mr. EDWARDS's last words on the floor of the House of Representatives show his love of his fellow man, his great Christian faith, and were truly prophetic.

On the 4th of March, 1931, the last day of the Seventy-first Congress, just before adjournment, he made his last speech in the House of Representatives, a most splendid tribute to Hon. Thomas M. Bell, who was retiring at the end of that session. In concluding that address, Mr. EDWARDS said:

> This hour brings sad thoughts. Many of us will never gather here again. To you all, in concluding, let me say, God be with you until we meet again.

The Christian life of Mr. EDWARDS was such that if he could have seen all his friends just before the end and had known he was to go so soon, he would have said:

> Say not "Good night," but in some brighter clime
> Bid me "Good morning."

He had every reason to gloriously sing:

> For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
> The flood may bear me far,
> I hope to see my Pilot face to face
> When I have crost the bar.

May the last words and prayer of our friend on this floor be answered. May we all join in his prayer and in the prayer of the poet—

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS wrote his own eulogy on the everlasting pages of history and on the noble hearts of his countrymen. The highest tribute we can offer is worth more to us than to him. His life was an inspiration and his memory is a benediction.

Mr. Speaker, during the first 12 years of my service here only two of my colleagues passed into the Great Beyond.

First I went to Georgia with all that was mortal of the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, and saw him returned to mother earth at Thomson, Ga. Several years later I left in Washington in apparently good health my good friend Hon. Leslie J. Steele, of the fifth Georgia district, only a few days later to be notified of his passing and to attend his funeral at Decatur, Ga., where I saw him for the last time until the great awakening.

Now during the last 12 months I have been notified of the death and attended the funeral of three of my beloved colleagues, first Hon. CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS, of the first congressional district, who was buried in Savannah; next Hon. Samuel Rutherford, who was buried in Forsyth; and last Senator William J. Harris, who was buried recently in Cedartown.

When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions.

Three nobler, truer friends of mankind never lived. Their work is imperishable. It will last as long as yonder sun shall shine.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS was born July 16, 1878, at Daisy, Evans County, Ga.; was reared on a farm; educated in the public schools, Gordon Institute at Barnesville, Ga.; later attended Florida State College, now University of Florida, and graduated from the University of Georgia with the degree of LL. B.

Immediately after his graduation he began the practice of law in Reidsville, Ga., where he continued to practice until December, 1900, when he located at Savannah, Ga. He was elected to the Sixtieth, Sixty-first, Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses from the first district of Georgia, and voluntarily retired March 4, 1917, when he again entered the practice of law at Savannah, Ga. In November, 1924, he was again elected to Congress from the first Georgia district, and was elected each succeeding term thereafter.

On July 13, 1931, while in conference with Congressman RAMSPECK and me in the office of Mr. RAMSPECK in the city of Atlanta, Ga., Mr. EDWARDS was suddenly stricken and passed away peacefully in my arms.

From the time he entered Congress, March 4, 1925, a warm personal friendship arose between us, which extended to the time of his sudden passing; and my intimate contact with him during these years afforded me opportunity to know his many virtues and splendid qualities. Of pleasing personality and always obliging, one had but to know him to admire him. Being jovial by nature and always courteous and polite, he was a veritable ray of sunshine among those with whom he associated. He was truly a prince among men.

He had an unusually alert mind, and the power of grasping and analyzing any question or proposition almost instantly, and was always ready with an answer to any question which arose.

He was an eloquent and forceful advocate, well grounded in the principles of law, and, indeed, was an able and accomplished lawyer.

As a legislator he was quite alert, yet conservative, and his appraisal and judgment on legislation was invariably sound. He was an energetic and intelligent worker, and never tired in the service of his constituents and in looking after their every want, whether great or small.

As an evidence of his popularity and the esteem in which he was held, many commendatory resolutions, and those of sympathy, were adopted, among which might be cited a resolution by the House of Representatives of Georgia; one by the State Senate of Georgia; one by the Kiwanis Club of Waycross; one by the Democratic executive committee of the first district of Georgia; one by the Bull Street Bible class of Savannah, Ga.; one by the commissioners of roads and revenue of Liberty County, Ga.; one by the Savannah District Council, No. 1, Daughters of the American Revolution; one by the Sons of Confederate Veterans, of Savannah, Ga.; one by the Savannah Aerie of Eagles, No. 330; one by the Commissioners' Court of Chatham County, Ga.; and a memorial by the bar of Chatham County, which is a splendid and most-deserved tribute to his life and character. This memorial is so appropriate and expressive that I venture to incorporate some brief extracts from it, as follows:

CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS lived a sacrificial life. He gave no thought of himself in his great undertaking for the upbuilding and betterment of the district which he served and the people whose good opinion he cherished. Truly, he gave his life for others. He was unaffected, open hearted, and sincere. No request for service by any constituent was ever unheeded by him. The rich and the poor, the humble and the exalted, were all his neighbors.

In his public life his career was without spot or blemish. He was clean and upright, generous to a fault, fair and honest with all. His word was his bond.

CHARLES GORDON EDWARDS impressed himself upon the minds and hearts of his people mainly because of their absolute faith in the integrity of his motives and in the rectitude of his purposes. He abhorred sham and hypocrisy.

The family of my departed friend consisted of his devoted wife, Mrs. Ora Beach Edwards, and his loyal son, Charles Beach Edwards; and it would be inappropriate to close these remarks without reference to his exemplary home life, where his shining qualities literally radiated. Knowing whereof I speak, I can truly say no husband and father was ever more affectionate and considerate. It seemed to be nature with him to anticipate and supply everything which would add to the pleasure and comfort of his splendid wife and son, and their relations in the home were ideal and reciprocal and might be termed a perfect home.

Mr. MOBLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement by Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE, as follows:

The biography of a public servant, like the biography of a private citizen, discloses little of the life and character of the man. Those who have served together in a common cause generally acquire a knowledge of the value and worth of the life and character of the true servant not revealed in the chronological account of those events which are noted by our fellow citizens in private life.

The world knows that CHARLES G. EDWARDS was elected to the Sixtieth Congress and served with distinction in the House of Representatives through the Sixtieth, Sixty-first, Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses; that his retirement at the end of the Sixty-fourth Congress was voluntary; and that he was again elected to the Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congress. His public career was closed by death during his service as a Member of the Seventy-second Congress. The friends and neighbors of CHARLEY EDWARDS knew that he was born and reared on a farm in Tattnall County, now Evans, of honorable parentage; that the Edwards family is a large and influential family in southeast Georgia; that Charley attended public schools of Tattnall County; Gordon Institute, at Barnesville, Ga.; Florida State College, then located at Lake City, Fla.; and that he graduated in law from the University of Georgia, in his native State.

He engaged in the general practice of law; served as president of the board of trade of his adopted city, Savannah, Ga.; as a member of the Savannah Harbor Commission; and was active throughout his life in the agricultural, commercial, civic, fraternal, educational, and religious life of his city and State.

He married Miss Ora Beach, the daughter of the Hon. and Mrs. W. W. Beach, of Waycross, Ga. His only son, Beach Edwards, is now an honored member of the Savannah bar. To his faithful wife and his son he left a legacy of a life of service—countless friends who knew and loved CHARLEY EDWARDS.

CHARLEY EDWARDS and I were born during the same year, 1878. He was my junior by a few months. During many years I knew him intimately and loved him devotedly. He acquired friends naturally and held them by his fidelity. At his death his friends in Congress were numbered by the membership of both the House and the Senate. Genial and unselfish, he happily excited no jealousies and died in the established affection of those who served with him as well as the great constituency of the old first district of Georgia, whom he served so long and so faithfully.

Born on a farm and reared among farmers, he loved them and worked untiringly for them, their wives, and their children. He took his place, nevertheless, in the life of a great city—historic Savannah, a city fortified by a glorious history and strengthened and inspired by its distinctive ideals and standards.

CHARLEY EDWARDS studied faithfully the larger problems before the Congress during his relatively long years of service and he worked untiringly for the interest of his district. He kept in constant and close touch with the people of his district without regard to rank or station. He possessed intimate knowledge of the needs and problems of his people; it would be difficult to name another Member of Congress from any State who gave more unsparingly of his time and thought to the service of his people.

His memory will be cherished by those who knew him at home and by those who were privileged to serve with him and to share his confidence and wise counsel in public affairs.

BIRD J. VINCENT

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, on July 18, 1931, Hon. BIRD J. VINCENT, for five terms a Representative from the eighth district of Michigan, died on his return from Hawaii, where he had gone in search of health. The news of his death brought sorrow to the many thousands in his district who had for years loved and honored him and to the Members of the House of Representatives who had the intimate knowledge of his fine qualities of heart and mind which our close association brings; his loss was, and continues to be, keenly felt.

In the 51 years of his life Mr. VINCENT had acquired a wealth of experience and knowledge which, with his health, he spent lavishly for the public good. The son of a Michigan farmer, he was admitted to the bar in 1905 and soon after entered upon a continuous career of public service which ended only with his death. In 1909 he became assistant prosecuting attorney of Saginaw County, and was later elected prosecuting attorney. Almost at once he gained the reputation of being a remarkable trial lawyer. This reputation was well deserved. I never knew a clearer thinker, nor one who could better analyze, in terse and pithy speech, a problem, whether legislative or legal, to which he bent his mind. He had the ability to state in a single sentence an involved proposition, legal or otherwise, more definitely than most experienced lawyers could do in many sentences. The ambiguous phrase, the word of doubtful application, had no place in his utterances. He unerringly selected the right word, the apt phrase. This made him a power in court and forum. Yet I think that his success with courts and juries and in this Chamber was due less perhaps to this than to his robust integrity, his reputation for truth and honesty and fair dealing, which followed him throughout his life.

Though always frail of body, he passed the rigorous test which in the early days of the war sent him overseas as a first lieutenant of Infantry. He served in France from July, 1918, to May 8, 1919, and reached his home in Saginaw to learn that the council of the city had tendered him the position of city attorney. He held this place with honor and ability until on the retirement of Hon. Joseph Fordney he was elected to the Sixty-eighth Congress.

Most of the present Members know of his work here. Most of them know of his brave struggle with ill health, the direct result of his military service. They know of his faithful work in committee and on the floor of the House. His fellow members of the Immigration Committee would tell you that he was its ablest lawyer. His great and lawyerlike presentation of the contested-election case of Hon. JAMES M. BECK won for him new admiration and esteem. He was one of the most valuable members of the Veterans' Committee. He rarely spoke from the floor, but when he did he had the attention of the House from the beginning to the end of his speech, and those who might not agree with him heard him with deep admiration and respect.

He was a brave soldier, a distinguished lawyer, and an efficient legislator. He added to the prestige of this body and to its usefulness. The last years of his life were a constant battle with disease and pain, but he toiled on undaunted and cheerful, doing each day's work well. To him the humbler task was as important as the greater. All of his energy, all of his devotion, all of his patriotism were at all times at the service of his constituents and his country.

"Earth may run red with other wars; he is at peace." The quiet spot at Saginaw where repose his ashes is a sacred spot to us who knew his worth. Soldier and statesman, lover of his country—sweet be his sleep and waking.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of paying a brief and humble tribute to the memory of my distinguished colleague, BIRD J. VINCENT, of Saginaw, who for nearly nine years served in this great legislative body the eighth congressional district of Michigan with honor, marked ability, and distinction.

Congressman VINCENT was cut off in the midst of a career of great promise and unusual accomplishment. He was exceptionally well equipped for the duties of his high office, having graduated from the law school of the University of Michigan, and after a period of private practice in the legal profession served nine years as assistant prosecuting attorney and prosecuting attorney of his county, which latter office he patriotically resigned to enter the United States Army at the outbreak of the war in 1917. He served as a first lieutenant of Infantry for 21 months, 10 months of which were spent on the battlefields of France. Returning to his native soil, he then took up the thread of his legal career, serving as city attorney of Saginaw until his election to the Sixty-eighth Congress.

The eighth congressional district of Michigan adjoins the tenth district which I have the honor to represent. Further, Mr. VINCENT's home city and mine adjoin. Our former acquaintance ripened into a fast friendship, which continued until his untimely death. He was of a very retiring and unassuming nature, but a man of rare judgment, discernment, and political sagacity. So well formed and mature were his judgments that his colleagues sought his counsel and relied upon his advice whenever matters of mutual concern to our beloved State and Nation were involved.

He was utterly unselfish in the discharge of public duties. He knew no other ideal of service except that which represented the best interests of his constituency and the American people. No interests, it mattered not how great or influential, and no cause, it mattered not to what extent it appeared to be backed by popular clamor and public sentiment, could ever swerve him from what he considered to be the path of truth and wisdom.

But this great devotion exacted a toll of health to which he paid no heed, in his zeal and undiminished exertions for the public weal.

In coming years when the young man shall enter the public service and shall seek for guidance and civic courage, he will find no more illustrious exemplar of the true and tried public servant than that of BIRD J. VINCENT, to whose memory we are to-day paying a feeble tribute.

SAMUEL COLLIER MAJOR

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, at this solemn hour we are again reminded that in the presence of life the mysterious messenger Death has invaded and depleted our ranks.

The Grim Reaper called from our midst one of the ablest statesmen serving in this great body, the Hon. SAMUEL C. MAJOR, of Missouri. He was my true, close friend. I deeply miss him. With a heart heavily laden with sorrow but ever filled with the choicest memories of my personal associations with him, I give these expressions in his honor.

It is difficult for the finite mind to comprehend why he should have been taken from us at a time when he was rendering such signal and valuable service to the Nation. His work has not ceased. He has merely been translated from this imperfect to that all-perfect celestial sphere where he may more fully function throughout eternity in the magnetic presence of Him who surely ordereth all things well. I am persuaded that approvingly at this hour he is viewing our efforts and would give us the message ceaselessly to battle for the public welfare.

SAMUEL C. MAJOR was born in Fayette, Howard County, Mo., July 2, 1869. After graduating from Central College of his home city and the St. James Military Academy of Macon, Mo., he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and because of his ability and sterling character, soon became one of the leading lawyers of central Missouri.

Following in the footsteps of his illustrious father, it was natural for him to desire to render service to the public. He was appointed prosecuting attorney of Howard County in 1892, and thereafter was twice elected to such office.

He was elected to the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth General Assemblies of Missouri. He was elected to the Sixty-sixth, Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, and Seventy-second Congresses. In all of his long and useful official life he rendered faithful and efficient services. He was never prompted by selfish motives but always had the single purpose to do those things best for the welfare of those whom he represented. In the National Congress he soon was recognized as one of its ablest and most influential Members. He was honored by being appointed to the major Committee on the Judiciary, and at the time of his death was recognized as one of the most influential members of such committee.

The footprints he left in the sands of time will ever be sure guideposts to point the way to those who follow in their efforts to serve the public. As his successor I feel my inability to measure up to the high standards set by him; but strengthened by the impress of his influence and ideals, I am given courage to battle for those principles of right and justice in which he so devoutly believed.

SAM MAJOR was a man of high, charitable, and noble character and purpose. He has left an impress for good in my State and the Nation that the lapse of time can not efface. He had the most ideal and happy home life and left a wife and two daughters to mourn his departure. As his friends, we sorrow with them; but with confidence and composure we look forward to that time when all mysteries shall be cleared away, when we shall fully know and understand, and when we shall again be reunited with our friends who have for a short time preceded us to those shores which are eternal.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. SAMUEL C. MAJOR this House lost one of its most beloved, useful, and influential Members. He brought to the discharge of his duties a well-trained mind, sound judgment, honest intellectual processes, industry, and an unusual capacity for efficient public service. He was an able and successful lawyer, well schooled in both the philosophy and the exalted traditions of his profession. The son of a lawyer of distinction, he was ambitious, by his own efforts, to achieve success in the profession that has so materially contributed to the founding and development of our free institutions. He had both the will and the ability to succeed. As Tennyson, in Aylmer's Field, said, he—

> Mastering the lawless science of our law,
> That codeless myriad of precedent,
> That wilderness of single instances,
> Thro' which a few, by wit or fortune led,
> May beat a pathway out to wealth and fame.

With SAMUEL C. MAJOR, justice was the life of the law, and, like Justinian, he looked upon our jurisprudence as the perfection of human reason and human experience functioning for the benefit of the public. He had a wholesome respect for the law, believing that where law ends there tyranny begins.

In the practice of law he held steadily to the high ideals of his profession. He was an eloquent and convincing speaker. His sincerity and candor disarmed his adversaries and bound men to him as with hoops of steel.

As a member of the State senate he served the people of his Commonwealth ably and honorably. As a Member of the House of Representatives, the greatest legislative body in the world, he was faithful to every trust. He was diligent and painstaking. He was loyal to his constituents. He endeavored to speak their language, reflect their wishes, protect their interests, and promote their welfare. He had the confidence and respect of his colleagues, who loved him for his many fine qualities of mind and heart. No dishonest dollar ever crossed his palm. He has left behind a record of faithful and efficient service.

In our feeble and finite method of thinking, we look upon the death of SAMUEL C. MAJOR as untimely; but measured by God's infallible standard, he lived out his allotted time and made his foreordained contribution to his day and generation. Out of the silent shadows he came into this old world to abide in the habitations of men three score and three years. While life is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time and then vanishes away; or a bubble, and its short duration forbids that we cherish long hopes, still SAMUEL C. MAJOR did not grumble or quarrel with destiny, but in the perplexities of his active professional and public career he met disappointment and the fortuitous concourse of events with a courage that challenged admiration.

His was not always a flower-skirted path. His lot was not one of ease, indolence, or unalloyed pleasure. Destiny decreed that he grapple with the stern realities of life. By hard knocks and by force of his own indomitable will he won his spurs and earned the respect of those with whom he touched elbows in his journey from the cradle to the grave.

In all the vicissitudes of a busy and strenuous career SAMUEL C. MAJOR held fast to his integrity and scorned to sacrifice principles on the sharp edge of expediency. He did not drift with the tide. His record was not written in shifting sands or sluggish dust but in the hearts and affection of all who came under the influence of his magnetic personality. He was not a broken and bruised reed, the sport of every wind of doctrine, but robust and steadfast in his convictions and in his devotion to his friends.

He was securely anchored in the confidence and good will of his constituents, who delighted to honor him as their Representative. When life's sun had scarcely passed its full meridian, weary from toil and bending beneath the load of an ever-increasing affliction, he returned from the Nation's Capital to the community that give him birth, and which to him was not only home but the most sacred place in all the earth. There among loyal and devoted friends he fought his last and only losing battle. There he watched the approach of the ever-lengthening evening shadows. There he saw the sun sink in the gray gathering western gloom. There he watched the swiftly flowing sands of life run their last course. There he saw the candle flicker and fade. There, in that holy and sacred environment, he lay down in that dreamless sleep that to this finite life knows no waking. There loving hands drew the curtain when his drama was played out. There Death kissed his lips into eternal silence. From the communion and companionship of friends and loved ones he passed over the Great Divide, down life's western slope, and across the tideless, waveless sea into that mysterious realm from whence his spirit came.

If we had the magic power, which one of us would recall him from the land of shadows? Who will question the wisdom of an overruling Providence in depriving us of his congenial companionship? Who among us will soon forget his smile, his handshake, his words of cheer, and the influence of his genial personality?

He was an honored son of old Howard, the mother of many Missouri counties, and the abode of as high type of citizenship as the world has so far produced. He was a worthy representative of that rugged race of Missourians who laid deep and strong the foundation of our great Commonwealth and built thereon our marvelous free institutions.

It was my mournful privilege to follow his pulseless clay to the silent city of the dead. In that sun-kissed, wind-swept, verdure-carpeted God's acre, all that is mortal of SAMUEL C. MAJOR is crumbling to dust, but his rich and rare and radiant spirit abides with the Infinite.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the death of SAM C. MAJOR came to me as a bolt from the blue. Under such circumstances we find ourselves ill prepared to meet the shock. If our kindly thoughts and affection could have stayed the hand of fate, he would have been spared. It was hard to witness his passing when we so much needed his kindly friendship, his genial comradeship, his judgment, and advice. He left behind an enviable record of service to his community, to his State, and to his Nation. He was honest, industrious, and courageous. His genial and pleasing personality won the love and respect of all.

The Nation has lost an able and courageous legislator, his colleagues a loyal companion, his district and State a capable, conscientious, and sympathetic servant. His wife has lost a faithful husband, his children a devoted father, and all the world a friend. To meet him was to respect him. To know him was to love him. Of him it can be said that he scattered flowers, radiated sunshine, and made the world a better place in which to live. It is fine to be able to say of him that he enjoyed the unstinted respect and love of those associated with him in the Nation's affairs. He wrote his name upon the honorable roster of those who served in this great arena and high upon the bright escutcheon of a glorious State. This fallen comrade believed that in the Christian faith he found the answer to the world's quest for life as well as the firm foundation of the Republic that he loved and served. He died sustained by the glorious hope of life beyond the tomb. He bequeathed to his family, to us, and to the world the heritage of an all-abiding, all-conquering faith. He loved his country, was a product of its institutions, an incarnation of its spirit. He held in sacred honor those principles of life and government, of social and industrial progress that have made America great and her people free. But he is with us no more. God's finger touched him and he slept.

So rest in that heavenly slumber,
Your toils and sorrows are past;
And the world that you love will rest also
When the peace of your dreams comes at last.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, SAM C. MAJOR was one of Missouri's great, good men. He was recognized as one of the outstanding lawyers of the State, learned and resourceful in his profession. For a number of years he served the people of his State in official life, where his services were of the highest and most efficient type. For several terms he represented his district and the Nation in the House of Representatives with great ability and distinction. His splendid public service is deeply appreciated by the people of the country and will be gratefully remembered. His brilliant public career was unfortunately brought to a close by the untimely hand of death, he having been elected to the Seventy-second Congress.

Those who knew him best had the most implicit confidence in him and few men were ever held in higher esteem by his close friends and associates. He was loyal, grateful, and devoted to his people. In any movement to help a friend he remained firm and steadfast to the end. Any cause he advocated had his undivided support and his untiring efforts until the fight was finished. He never wavered or turned his back in the thick of the fray. He was public-spirited, generous, and kind.

His sociable and genial disposition is remembered by all. Faultfinding, criticism, grumbling, and complaining had no part in his make-up. Gloom and despondency, sadness and despair were unknown to his philosophy of life. He always spoke a word of good cheer and brought with him joy and laughter and left in his wake smiles and gladness. His time was not spent in the shades and in the shadows, but he lived in the broad, bright light of day, pushing back the curtains of doubt and gloom and despair to let in the blessed sunshine of fellowship and good will. The world is better, brighter, and happier by reason of his sojourn in it.

Of striking, attractive personality, of great and splendid ability, of affable and friendly disposition, of polished and refined manners, of sturdy, stalwart manhood, and of fine, sterling character, he made his impress upon his State and Nation, and his multitude of friends mourn his passing.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. SAM C. MAJOR, late a Representative in Congress from the seventh Missouri district, this House lost one of its most able and most beloved Members. Mr. MAJOR, or "Sam" to those who knew and loved him, was my neighbor. Born and reared in adjoining counties, we early came to know each other, and to know SAM MAJOR was to have a real affection for him. We served together in the Missouri Legislature, where he made a record for efficiency, faithfulness, and devotion to duty, just as he later made in the National Congress.

The son of a distinguished lawyer and one of central Missouri's outstanding citizens, Representative MAJOR lent further luster to the family name. Many times honored by the voters, he nevertheless remained a plain, everyday American, never once permitting himself to feel that he had been lifted out from among the people he so devotedly loved. Always he was one of them. He was democratic, never puffed up, never unduly proud, always approachable.

It is doubtful if in recent years there has been in this House a Member more universally loved. Never surrendering his convictions, he was always tolerant of the views of the other man, and differences of opinion never separated him from a friend. Big of heart, of mind, and of body, he looked for bigness rather than for littleness in folks, and, looking for it, found it.

When, after weeks of illness, Mr. MAJOR passed on to that better land, the people of his home county of Howard and of the great State of Missouri gathered at Fayette to do honor to his memory and to indicate the great love and admiration they had for a man among men.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, when the Sixty-sixth Congress closed, Hon. SAM MAJOR and myself told each other good-by as we started to our respective homes, both with the purpose of retiring from public life. We had both been defeated in the presidential landslide.

When I returned to the Sixty-eighth Congress the first man I spoke to in the new Congress was my old friend, SAM MAJOR. We resumed a friendship that lasted until his going.

"Sam," as he was affectionately called by his colleagues, was a lawyer of great ability and was placed upon the great Judiciary Committee, where he served with great distinction. He was a representative of the masses and had the human sympathy in his heart that touches all mankind.

It is sad to contemplate the death of a friend, a brother, a sister, a father, or a mother; but rather would I look at death as a temporary separation, the beginning of a new life, a life better, nobler, and greater than the one through which we are now passing—an advanced step in God's eternal plan.

SAMUEL C. MAJOR was an outstanding figure in the House and a splendid debater on the floor. He was a splendid man, a loyal citizen of his country, and a devoted officer of his Government. He won a deep-seated affection in my heart and in the heart of his colleagues. His passing was a distinct loss to the House, to his district, and to the State which he so ably represented here. America needs now, and in the future, men of the fiber of SAM MAJOR.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, Hon. SAM C. MAJOR, former Representative of the seventh congressional district of Missouri, was born in Fayette, Howard County, Mo., on July 2, 1869, and there he spent his notable life. He bore the same name as his distinguished father and grandfather. He was educated in the public schools and Central College at Fayette and St. James Military Academy at Macon, Mo. He married Miss Elizabeth M. Simpson, of St. Louis, on December 17, 1895. He was admitted to the bar in July, 1890. A lawyer by profession, he enjoyed a large and successful practice. He was prosecuting attorney of his county for three terms, State senator from his district, and Representative in Congress for four terms, and elected for the fifth term from a great district which he served with marked and distinguished ability.

He was loved as few men are. I was in his little city during his last illness, and I attended his funeral when a great concourse of relatives and friends gathered from far and near to do honor to his memory. Time and again I heard on the streets of his home city, "Everybody loved SAM MAJOR." He was a loyal friend, a most lovable character, of marked ability, natural in his conduct and manners and methods. He abounded in common sense. He was worthy of the trust and confidence of all who knew him. He was my friend, and that friendship I valued. I loved him for his great worth and his manly qualities of mind and heart. He was one of God's noblemen. With sorrow and a sweet recollection of his many virtues, I am glad to pay humble tribute in a few simple words to his memory.

To say more would be but to amplify the deeds and value of the life of this unusual man. His work and industry were notable in every line of duty. His services as prosecuting attorney were notable, aggressive, and efficient. His record as State senator was of great service to his State. It was dignified and constructive and laid the foundation for wider and greater service in the National House of Representatives, where he commanded the respect, admiration, and confidence of all who knew and served with him. He had a clear mind and reached his own conclusions after close study of every essential problem submitted to Congress.

An outstanding element in the character of this able legislator was his courage in standing by his convictions. He sought the right on every proposition and boldly, by word and vote, declared his position. He was a strong man, worthy of the great confidence given him by his constituents. He left a record and history of which all his friends are justly proud.

A great lawyer, a noted legislator and loyal friend, a most lovable character, and a great citizen has gone into the Great Beyond with a sweet memory of his many virtues left as a legacy for all who knew him.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, Hon. SAMUEL C. MAJOR is gone. He was a friend to mankind. He was accommodating, industrious, and courageous. His very presence brought cheerfulness and encouragement. His ability and integrity engendered confidence in the hearts of those with whom he was associated. He rejoiced with his friends in their success and sympathized with them in their sorrow. Thousands will remember him and revere his memory through all the days of their lives.

Although there is an empty chair at the council table of his political party in the grand old State of Missouri, his code of ethics will ever be accepted as a standard of "fair play" and "a square deal."

The loving companionship and confidence which he shared with his family was beautiful to behold. Seemingly his every wish and care in life were centered upon his charming wife and sweet and accomplished daughters, and they, his loved ones, and we, his friends, may find consolation in the thought that "'Tis not death to live in hearts we leave behind."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the death of SAMUEL COLLIER MAJOR, a Representative from Missouri, was not only a distinct shock to his colleagues but to his thousands of friends in his home State where he was born and lived throughout the period of his life.

Admitted to the bar in 1890, he entered public life in 1892 and served as prosecuting attorney in his own city. He was a member of the State Senate of Missouri and was first elected to Congress in 1919. His knowledge of both civil and criminal law made him a very valuable member of the Judiciary Committee of the House.

He had an outstanding personality, and made friends with everyone who came in contact with him. Honored by his State and the Nation, his name will always be prominent among distinguished officials who served the people of Missouri.

ERNEST ROBINSON ACKERMAN

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, why is it that ERNEST ACKERMAN has been called to his final reward when there was so much to be done that none could do as well as he?

From the first day I sat in this House until we went home at the close of the Seventy-first Congress he was my friend. His many kindnesses and aids in participation in legislation on the floor of the House will remain outstanding long after some one comes to take my place. That man will be fortunate, indeed, if he finds one as able and willing as Mr. ACKERMAN to be a friend in his case of need.

He might disagree with you, but he never maintained resentment. He granted to each man the right to think and act according to the dictates of his own conscience. If an able presentation of facts seemed to produce a conclusion different from that reached by him, never did he resort to threat or the show of anger or force to influence a decision. Loyalty was his watchword. True to himself, he was always true to his friends. Punctual at all times, he could always be trusted to keep an engagement or fulfill a promise. In legislation he was dependable, a good judge of men and of measures. His wide experience from business and legislative activity, travels in our own and in foreign countries, and continual study and observation, kept him in the forefront at all times in his last chosen field of endeavor where all kinds and classes of the able men of this country meet in a forum to direct the destinies of this Nation.

In his responsible position upon the powerful Appropriations Committee he was mindful of his country's welfare first, last, and all the time. His breadth of view and grasp of national and international problems was exceeded by none.

He was able, diligent, and a devoted public servant as well as a genial gentleman. The country has lost a good American, a fine citizen, and an able legislator.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to extend remarks, I include the following statement of Hon. HAMILTON F. KEAN, United States Senator from New Jersey:

During the few months that have intervened since the adjournment of the Seventy-first Congress and the calling of the Seventy-second Congress there have been many untimely deaths in the House of Representatives, Members taken in the prime of their lives and at the peak of their usefulness to their country in the offices to which they were elected.

At a time when he was performing the best service of a life filled with good works, ERNEST ROBINSON ACKERMAN was stricken and soon thereafter was called to enter upon a rest fully earned. His established character and long record of deeds well done assure him a high place in the endearing memory of all who came in contact with him. Many who had never talked with him face to face had been benefited by his counsel ripened by years of experience and broadened by extensive travel, study, and observation. With profound sadness we bow to the will of Providence and resign ourselves to the irreparable losses we have suffered.

Mr. ACKERMAN was born in 1863; he died at his home in Plainfield, N. J., on October 18, 1931, after a very short illness. Like a great many boys of his time, he did not have the advantage of an opportunity to pursue a long period of schooling, so that we find him at a rather tender age at a busy corner in New York City actively engaged in the sale of newspapers. He became interested in the collection of postage stamps and at the age of 15 years began a stamp-collecting business, which five years later he sold, together with the good will and list of customers, and thereupon moved to New Jersey, where he resided until his demise.

Obtaining a position of office boy with the Lawrence Cement Co., Mr. ACKERMAN advanced successively through the posts of shipping clerk, bookkeeper, traveling salesman, general sales agent, and finally president of the company. From boyhood his life had been clean, active, and always marked with the greatest kindness and consideration of others. He became interested in public affairs, and at one time was a member of the City Council of Plainfield, N. J. In 1905 he was elected to the Senate of New Jersey, being president of that body in 1911, during the administration of Woodrow Wilson as governor. During the absence of the then Governor Wilson, by reason of his being president of the Senate, Mr. ACKERMAN became acting governor of the State.

With the entry of our country in the World War, Mr. ACKERMAN, long past the age for bearing arms, devoted practically all of his time and energies to our Nation's civilian offensive and defensive activities. Liberty bond, war-saving stamp, and Red Cross drives had his enthusiastic support. Social enterprises for the benefit of the men in the cantonments and trenches engaged his most untiring efforts, and finally, when it was necessary as a defensive measure to conserve at home all of the foodstuffs as far as possible, he was made Federal food administrator for Union County, N. J.

In 1919 Mr. ACKERMAN was elected to the House of Representatives from the fifth district of New Jersey, which he represented continuously until the time of his death. In the House of Representatives he was well known as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as chairman of the committee that passed on expenditures in the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor. His splendid human qualities, legislative experience, moral courage, quick understanding, and warm sympathy stood him well in hand in those days when the Congress was legislating on the mass of important problems immediate to the ending of the greatest conflict in history.

Mr. ACKERMAN had a charming personality. He had the love, respect, and confidence of the people of the district he so ably represented. While he may have differed in opinion with some of his associates in the House, yet his opinion was held in high regard as he himself enjoyed the respect of his fellow Members.

Mr. ACKERMAN was a devoted Representative to the requirements of his district. No request from the humblest of his constituency was too small or insignificant for him to give his personal attention to its solution. He pursued his onerous tasks, which multiplied as his usefulness in the House increased, with unflagging vigor and gave the best that was in him to the tasks of his office. He was an ideal Representative, one who never tired of undertaking the problems of his constituency and pursuing each one to its conclusion.

I have known ERNEST R. ACKERMAN for many years. His character was above reproach. He graced his honorable position in the Halls of Congress with dignity and real ability. I had many contacts with him socially, politically, and in business, and always found him to be a man of unusual attainments, a man whose word could be depended on, and whom it was always a joy and pleasure to meet and an honor to call friend.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of ERNEST R. ACKERMAN, of New Jersey, the House of Representatives, the State of New Jersey, and the Nation lost one of the ablest and most dependable public servants.

It was my great privilege to be closely acquainted with Congressman ACKERMAN since he was a member of the Senate of the State of New Jersey over a quarter of a century ago. In that body he rendered outstanding service to the State, notably in the inauguration of a system of classified civil service. In the House of Representatives his outstanding merit was recognized, and he early won a place for himself on the important and powerful Committee on Appropriations. I have frequently heard the former great chairman of this committee, Hon. Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, speak of his work in terms of unstinted praise.

ERNEST ACKERMAN cared nothing for showmanship and publicity and never indulged in oratorical flights. His work was thorough and accurate, reflecting his experience, intelligence, and impeccable rectitude. His dominant qualities in public and private life were his unshakable character and his passion for the right and the truth.

Blessed are the pure in heart.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, within a period of 15 years the House of Representatives has been twice called together to honor the memory and public service of a Representative from the fifth congressional district of the State of New Jersey.

To-day we assemble to express our feelings of praise and admiration for a man who wove his way into the hearts of all of us who have had the privilege of serving with him.

ERNEST ACKERMAN, as he always insisted upon my calling him and felt keenly hurt if addressed with any less familiar title, was a gentleman of the old school and of a character rare to find in these modern times.

Quiet, unassuming, gracious at all times, we shall miss his courtly manner in the halls of this House. Coming from a different section of my State, it was not my good fortune to know ERNEST ACKERMAN until he was elected to Congress as the successor of the late Congressman Capstick. It did not take long to become acquainted with him, and in a few years' time we developed a friendship which I shall always remember and cherish.

He first began his public service in the council of his home city in 1891, and it is a coincidence that my own first appearance in public life was in the city council of my home town. He was next elected to serve his county in the State legislature; here he was accorded a greater honor than that bestowed upon me, for my next promotion was to the house of assembly. In later years we were both to find service in the House of Representatives of the National Congress.

In all the years of his public service he gave to his constituency the best that was in him. He was a legislator of keen perception and sound judgment, and, in my opinion, he was seldom wrong in his vote on the many perplexing questions that harassed the country and the Congress during his service in the House.

ERNEST ACKERMAN was a world traveler of note; for many years he made it a practice to spend his vacations in foreign countries, and the knowledge which he gained as a result served him to great advantage in his work in the House.

In his passing on to a greater and happier sphere, there to reap the reward so justly deserved by the exemplary life which he led on Mother Earth, we of this Congress have lost a real friend, while the State of New Jersey and the Nation have lost an able, intelligent, and efficient Representative. Those who mourn his loss more intimately may well find comfort and fortitude in the knowledge that he was a devoted husband, an affectionate brother, and a true friend.

FLETCHER HALE

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to suitably express myself on this sad occasion. As I stand here to-day I am conscious of a sense of great personal loss.

FLETCHER HALE was born at Portland, Me., January 22, 1883; attended the public schools; was graduated from the English High School, Boston, Mass., in 1900, and from Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., in 1905; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1908, and commenced practice in Littleton, N. H.; moved to Laconia, N. H., in 1912, and continued the practice of his profession; city solicitor of Laconia in 1915; solicitor for Belknap County, 1915–1920; member of the board of education, 1916–1925, and served as chairman, 1918–1925; delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1918; member of the State tax commission, 1920–1925; trustee of the New Hampshire Orphans' Home at Franklin, N. H., in 1923. In 1925 he was elected as a Republican to the Sixty-ninth Congress and reelected to the Seventieth, Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congresses. In the Seventieth Congress he was assigned membership on the important Naval Affairs Committee, and his work on this committee won words of praise for him from the former chairman, the late Thomas S. Butler, of Pennsylvania.

FLETCHER HALE was my friend and colleague. My heart reaches out to his bereaved family with sincere sympathy and understanding because my own grief is so poignant. There is not one of us who has come here to-day to mourn for him and pay tribute to his memory who feels otherwise. His honest, intelligent, and faithful service here commanded our respect. His personality and his friendship won our love and affection. We all realize that the House, the State of New Hampshire, and the Nation have lost a loyal citizen—a truly good man has passed away; a wise legislator; a splendid, outstanding citizen; an able and successful lawyer; a good and intensely loyal friend; a devoted husband and father. This epitomizes the life and character of FLETCHER HALE, whose death grieved his colleagues, shocked his friends and acquaintances. It was on the return voyage from Europe, where he attended as a delegate the Interparliamentary Union at Geneva, that he became ill and died October 22, 1931, at a hospital in Brooklyn, N. Y., soon after reaching the United States.

FLETCHER HALE was an ardent Republican; he earnestly believed in the principles of his party; and because he believed in them, he never failed to take an active part in campaigns. While an intense partisan, he was broadminded and tolerant in all of his views and never allowed partisanship to interfere with his personal friendships or permitted it to influence his position on public questions which did not strictly involve matters of party policy. He was honest, both intellectually and morally; he despised sham and duplicity. I want to say of my deceased colleague and friend that he loved his country, he loved his fellow men, and was willing to make sacrifices that his life might not be lived in vain.

Those of us who worship the living God, although we can not always understand His ways, are fortified by our unswerving trust in Him and are comforted even in death. Though we lose those nearest and dearest to our hearts, we are given the courage to say, "Thy will be done." Fortified and sustained by "an unfaltering trust," death is not hideous to one who lived a life like FLETCHER HALE, rather is it beautiful—the step from this world to eternity, from whose realms no traveler ever returns.

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea,

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark;

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place,
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, by the death of FLETCHER HALE the House of Representatives lost one of its most promising Members. He had been steadily growing in the confidence of the House—that confidence which is the first requisite for influence. His fellow Members were learning that his information was accurate, that his judgments were sound, that his sincerity was complete, that his courage was constant. He had shown himself capable of expressing his thoughts felicitously and effectively.

Gifted with a good voice, possessing a ready command of language and exceptional clarity of statement, he won attention whenever he took the floor. It was all the better for his effectiveness that he did not speak often, for thereby his fellow Members learned that he was sagacious enough not to speak unless he had something to say, unless he could tell his fellow Members something they did not already know or could lay before them fresh argument. As chance came he had presided in a way that won warm commendation. He was well on the road to higher honors. It is not given to us to understand why a career so hopeful of great benefit to his country should be brought so abruptly to an end. Grieving for the loss of what might yet have been, we must perforce content ourselves with gratitude for what had been.

In the reasons for gratitude those of us who were blessed by close acquaintance will include his endowment with those qualities that most conduce to friendship—the qualities of kindliness, cheerfulness, generosity, sympathy, modesty, candor. These made companionship with him a delight. In Congress, as indeed in any other of the relationships of life, men do not help their associates by lofty intellectual effort alone. The day's work is in no small part matter of routine. Fortunately there are interludes in the work itself, and when the day is over, there must be hours of relaxation. When in such hours chance brought me in contact with FLETCHER HALE, his charm always made the contact happier. It was good to be with him. By reason of the traits that made for friendship we are grateful that we knew him. To us their memory will be precious.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of FLETCHER HALE the State of New Hampshire, as well as the entire Union, mourn and deplore the loss of a capable Representative in the Congress of the United States.

His attention to duty, his fidelity to his trust, his capacity, and his official and personal integrity were most profound. It made a deep impression not only upon the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, upon which he served with outstanding distinction, but upon the whole membership of the House of Representatives.

FLETCHER HALE's life was one of unceasing activity. With him each attainment was but a step upon the stairway that led to higher places of advancement.

His rise at the bar was rapid, continuous in its progress, and conspicuous in its achievements. He was a lovable man and was greatly beloved on both sides of the House.

He was first of all a loyal friend and was possessed of a charming personality that made itself evident where he chanced to be. His companionship was kind, considerate, and most attractive.

FLETCHER HALE had original ideas concerning the national defense and was a valuable member of the important Committee on Naval Affairs, where naval policies upon which the very life of the Nation depended were made effective. His absence from this committee is a real loss to the Nation.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to express, even measurably, my sense of loss as an individual sustained in the sudden death of my friend and associate FLETCHER HALE, of the State of New Hampshire. We were close personal friends, and I entertained for him a real affection. I shall never fail to remember his exceeding kindness, his fine inspiration, his wonderful fellowship, and his earnest and sincere purpose to be helpful to others.

"Fletcher," as we intimately and affectionately knew him, was ever at the command of his friends and colleagues when opportunity offered to lend a helping hand or to do a kindly deed. He was an able and courageous legislator, an eminent lawyer, and an outstanding American of the highest type.

It is, indeed, most fitting that those who knew his worth through daily and intimate association should gather in this Chamber, where the most important and effective part of his work was done, for the purpose of expressing sincere and affectionate appreciation of a life dedicated in high degree to the public service. The tributes paid to him are well deserved, because they were earned by years of devotion to the interests of our country, because his record as a Representative in Congress was characterized at all times by zeal for the public good. To the people who trusted and honored him he gladly gave all that was highest and best in him.

My work with him as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs imbued me with his high principle, his ever-present sense of honesty, and his indomitable will to do the right as his conviction led him to see the way.

I humbly commend to his stricken wife and children and to his myriad of loyal friends the memory of this good man, and I desire to record for the sake of posterity and for the benefit of the loved ones he left behind my deep appreciation of his personal worth and the value of his service to his State and to the Republic.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Speaker, there were 69 of us new in the Sixty-ninth Congress, and with all of us there was a regard and liking for FLETCHER HALE, rugged son of New Hampshire. So close I felt to him that the honor of expressing that regard, though a labor of love, is yet no easy task.

We found in him the straightforward virtues that we come to expect in the sons of the Granite State. With him, too, there was a smile that bespoke a manly friendliness of character and consideration for his fellow man. Among the younger men in Congress there was none for whom a brighter prospect shone. He spoke not often, but when he spoke it was with the authority that comes with definite knowledge and clear thought. With him a broad tolerance for the other point of view served but to accentuate and not to compromise his own clear cut course and logical goal.

When we come to appraise and measure the manly virtues of the man we knew, again shines out the modest courage, the unselfish adherence to duty, the thoughtful, kindly hand of FLETCHER HALE.

When he was laid to rest mid those New Hampshire hills on that windy autumn day, the people he served so well came to pay their last tribute to their fallen leader. Their number seemed as the autumn leaves that fell.

They gathered from Mount Monadnock on the south and Mount Washington on the north, from shop and mill and sugar grove they came, from modest home and executive mansion, the section hand and the president of the road, and met in Laconia's lovely churchyard. In hushed and quiet multitudes their very presence said, "In honoring this man we do honor ourselves." As did his friends in Congress, so did they recognize the untimely end of a career honorable in his country's service.

For his countless friends in New Hampshire and in Congress I quote a verse of Kipling's that might well be our guiding star, as certainly as it typifies FLETCHER HALE:

Stand to your work and be strong, halting not in your ways,
Baulking the end half won for an instant dole of praise.
Stand to your work and be wise—certain of sword and pen,
Who are neither children nor gods, but men in a world of men.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, FLETCHER HALE, of the first New Hampshire district, was one of those New England legislators to whom public office meant an opportunity to serve his country.

Born in Maine, educated in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, Representative HALE was endowed with the finest qualities of the New England tradition. He was straightforward. He never hedged or trimmed. There was never doubt as to where he stood, never reason to wonder if he had meant what he said.

All these qualities of stanchness and forthrightness were graced with a sense of humor and an amiability of personality which endeared him to his associates in Congress and in private life. It was easy and pleasant to know him. Honor and conscience were decorated and mellowed with tolerance and wit.

An able lawyer, he served his community and his Nation in ways for which he had prepared himself in his education and background. He went to public schools, to the English High School in Boston, to Dartmouth College. He was solicitor for Belknap County, N. H., for five years, and during nearly all of that time and for five years thereafter his interest in education led him naturally to membership on the board of education and to its chairmanship for seven years. He also extended his interest in education to the less-fortunate children by serving from 1923 until his death as a trustee of the New Hampshire Orphans' Home.

In addition to his legal and educational services, FLETCHER HALE served his State in a fiscal capacity as member of the State tax commission for five years, and helped write the State's present constitution as a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1918.

In Congress Representative HALE was particularly interested in the development of the Navy, and was a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. His interest in international comity took him to the Interparliamentary Union in 1931, and it was on his way home from that meeting that he became ill and died before he was 49 years old.

His early death is a loss to his State and his country, and a personal loss to his friends. We had all expected many more years of usefulness from him and many more years of pleasant association with him on Capitol Hill.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, the sudden death of our late colleague Hon. FLETCHER HALE, of New Hampshire, was a severe shock to all of us, and I felt a deep sense of personal loss, for he was a dear friend and associate.

My intimate acquaintance and close association with FLETCHER HALE was brought about by our service together on the Committee on Naval Affairs and the further fact that our offices were practically adjoining. Therefore, I had the opportunity to know him well, to realize the worth and beauty of his character, as well as to appreciate his many sterling qualities and to respect his judgment and ability. He performed his work as a Member of Congress with all the diligence and conscientiousness that he would have devoted to his own personal affairs.

Though his life of 48 years was far too short, yet it was long enough to demonstrate possibilities of great promise for the future. I know as our acquaintance prolonged my admiration for him only increased. I have every reason to believe that the splendid reputation borne by him in Washington was fully shared by his constituency, who had repeatedly expressed their confidence in him at the polls.

FLETCHER HALE was ever ready to serve a friend. He rendered a distinct service to me when he accompanied me to my district and delivered an address at the Lincoln banquet of the Germantown Republican Club, which was one of the most inspiring, instructive, and entertaining speeches ever delivered before this club. He made many friends in Germantown, and they were greatly grieved to learn of his recent death.

It is a privilege to have served and labored with this young statesman and to have enjoyed his friendship.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I undertake an expression of my appreciation of FLETCHER HALE, for it brings the bitter reminder that we shall see him no more in this world. Although I was privileged to know him only during the last four years of his life, he had my enduring regard and when he died it was as if I had lost a lifelong friend.

Like many others, I sought his company and friendship after first acquaintance, attracted by that rare quality we call charm and encouraged by his amiable disposition and unaffected manner. Cheerful, humorous, keenly intelligent, he was a delightful companion. He was honored and respected by all who knew him for his honesty, courage, and exceptional ability; and he had the deep affection of those to whom he gave his confidence and friendship. Rarely in my lifetime have I known a man whose companionship I enjoyed so much, whose character and talent I appraised so highly, or whose friendship I valued so greatly.

He had seriousness of purpose and maturity of judgment, but he never lost the optimism and buoyancy of youth in his outlook on life. He had dignity and self-respect, but he was always modest and considerate in his relations with his fellows and he was the sort people in trouble turned to, because they trusted him instinctively.

He had none of the acquisitive instinct which dominates the lives and aspirations of most of the people on earth. His life was dedicated to public service and to kindly and generous acts toward those who needed help. He acquired little of the world's goods, because the amassing of wealth was of slight consequence in his philosophy of life. The splendid woman who is his widow and his two fine boys have the admiration and deepest compassion of a multitude of friends and well-wishers as they face the world with brave and dauntless spirit.

I had the good fortune to sit with him on the Naval Affairs Committee of the House for four years. He was a skillful and painstaking legislator. Unobtrusive, he never sought the center of the stage or entered into headline-provoking controversies, but out of clear-headed thinking and conscientious study he made many valuable contributions to the consideration of the questions that came before that committee, and by his gentle persistence and convincing speech he exerted a marked influence on the legislation that came from the Naval Affairs Committee. Respect was paid to his opinion and deference to his judgment by his colleagues.

He believed in a strong, efficient, modern Navy because he was passionately patriotic. There was nothing of the sword-rattler or the jingo about him, but neither was he a weak sentimentalist. His supreme desire was to secure the peace and security of his country and he had no taint of internationalism.

He did not often speak on the floor of the House or extend his remarks in the RECORD, and never for self-glorification or selfish political purposes. He took the floor when his responsibility for legislation required it or when moved by deep conviction and a sense of duty. When he spoke he was listened to, because he spoke with earnestness, with knowledge of his subject, and with the art of a natural orator.

He was an effective speaker in the House or on the platform. Not only did he have the oratorical requirements of voice, gesture, and presence, but his words carried the conviction that springs from the logical thinking of an orderly mind and the inspiration that is born of absolute sincerity and high purpose.

I recall with the pleasure a man has in the success of a good friend the occasion when FLETCHER HALE last presided over the House as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. A controversial bill was under consideration, the House was inclined to be disorderly, many puzzling points of order were made. He presided with exceptional dignity and fairness; his decisions were prompt, concise, and clearly expressed; and when he stepped down to report to the Speaker, he received the most enthusiastic applause I have seen accorded any presiding officer since I have been a Member of the House, and the best deserved.

FLETCHER HALE had the mental capacity and moral strength to fill the highest places of public trust. His natural gifts inspired public confidence and attracted a steadily widening circle of loyal friends. He seemed destined to carry heavy responsibilities in these troublous times when people are searching for strong men to lead them. His taking off is doubly grievous because he died in the full prime of manhood. When a fatal disease claimed him with tragic suddenness a valuable and useful life was ended and his country lost a man of true statesmanlike qualities and extraordinary promise of greater service in the years to come. And I have lost a cherished and beloved friend whose death I shall never cease to mourn.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult for those left behind when a true friend and colleague is called upon to lay down his life. It is particularly difficult when that life is one of full vigor and of brilliant promise. Under such conditions the loss is not merely personal; it is national.

The life of Hon. FLETCHER HALE, of New Hampshire, was such a life. Devoted largely to public service, it was characterized by devotion to duty, by ever-increasing usefulness, by qualifications which seemed to carry with them the assurance of still greater responsibility, of still greater contribution to district, to State, and to Nation.

Born in 1883, a graduate of Dartmouth College in 1905, an attorney by profession, his fine abilities enabled him to serve his city, his county, and his State as a member of the city board of education for about 9 years, 7 years as its chairman, as city solicitor for about a year, as county solicitor for about 5 years, and as tax commissioner of New Hampshire for a further period of about 5 years.

Elected in 1924 to the Sixty-ninth Congress, relected in 1926, 1928, and 1930 to the succeeding Congresses, his unusual qualifications were quickly recognized in the service of the Nation. Thorough in research, sound in conclusion, he played an important part in the work of the House Committee on Naval Affairs. A trained speaker, a good parliamentarian, he won for himself a position of confidence and increasing influence in the House as a whole. Twice during the closing months of his career he was called upon by Speaker Longworth to preside over the House in the consideration of bills of contentious and difficult character. Those who were present at the time will recall the decision and dispatch with which the bills were handled and the acclaim accorded him by the House as a whole at the conclusion of the consideration in each instance.

It was my privilege to see much of our colleague during the four sessions of Congress immediately preceding his death. Coming to Congress in December of 1928, I found myself turning to him for information and for counsel. I came to regard him not only as a close personal friend but as one of the soundest and most promising of the younger Members of the House.

His character, his ability, his judgment, his courage stamped him as one destined to play a still greater rôle in the service of the American people. His untimely death at the age of 48 was an incalculable loss—a loss to a host of devoted friends and admirers won during a life of public service, a loss to the country as a whole, deprived of the promise of further contribution of greater distinction. America, Mr. Speaker, can ill afford the loss of one so conscientious, so able, so fearless, in these difficult times through which we are passing.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, others will speak of the political career of FLETCHER HALE. They will refer to his experience as an important official of the State of New Hampshire and his efficient service as a Congressman from that State.

If I were to comment upon FLETCHER HALE's official life, I could truthfully say that in my judgment no man with whom I have come in contact in Congress in recent years had a more brilliant future in prospect than he. He was able, popular, a careful student of legislation, endowed with a keen mind and conservative judgment; he was young, with an expectation of years of service, and by all the measures of human comparisons the future had in store for him inestimable rewards.

However, in the brief references I desire to make to FLETCHER HALE I shall not touch upon this part of his life and character. I want to take for my subject a few words which he once said to me. We were talking about a prominent hotel in a leading summer resort where we had both been guests. In his quiet way he said to me, "Allen, I used to be a bell hop in that hotel." The remark impressed me, but little did I think I would have occasion to refer to it in this manner.

I class FLETCHER HALE as one of the most typical examples of a successful citizen with whom it has been my good fortune to be thrown into contact. He was a poor country lad, dependent upon his own efforts to obtain an education. He worked his way through college, earning a few dollars during the vacation period at a summer resort. He secured his own meals in college by waiting on his classmates. He studied law under adverse conditions and under financial limitations.

Possibly as thorough a test as any of a young man's ability to complete his education is to start life in a moderate-sized New England town. Making good under such conditions, where neighbors are familiar with life's details, is a true test. This FLETCHER HALE undertook and won. Following his marriage and undoubtedly aided by his wife, who herself had made her own way as a teacher, young HALE progressed step by step until he became an outstanding figure not only in his home community of Laconia but in the State of New Hampshire.

Let me, however, revert to my original thought of FLETCHER HALE as a friend and companion rather than as a lawyer and official. When the sad news was flashed over the wire last October of his sudden death while returning from abroad, the first thought that came to me was of the personal loss of a friend. My associations with him were more outside the Halls of Congress than within. The feeling of sadness was at the departure of a real comrade and chum, one with whom I had associated before he became a Congressman in the companionship that comes to men through like interests in athletics and social activities where there is no gloss or frills and where the real fellow is with you. FLETCHER HALE was the personification of a friend. This is not intended to be the eulogy of a Congressman but of a real American. No title can compare in value with that of a successful American citizen. I will regard FLETCHER HALE always as typical of that designation, a self-made, thoroughgoing, true American citizen.

Ah, friendship, stronger in thy might
Than time and space, as faith than sight!
Rich festival with thy red wine
My friend and I will keep, in courts divine.
—Helen Hunt Jackson.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, in availing myself of the privilege of joining my colleagues in paying tribute to those of this body who have "passed beyond" I do so with mixed feelings of appreciation and regret; regret in the realization that those familiar faces are no longer with us; appreciation in the knowledge of their lives and what they have contributed to our Nation's welfare.

It is my purpose, however, to speak briefly of one whose attributes, ability, and accomplishments particularly endeared him to his associates and from whose all-too-brief association came, for me, ties of friendship and esteem which the realization of separation can not efface.

Others have spoken of FLETCHER HALE's ability and splendid record of public service, of the use to which he put the faculties with which he was endowed, and have described his upward march from boyhood through one of our Nation's leading universities to his chosen profession of the practice of law. Full credit has been given in his record of various offices of public trust and esteem leading to his position of high regard in the Congress of the United States as representative of his district.

It is a record of accomplishment and success based on a determination and a sincerity of purpose which come to those who not only have the ability to see clearly but are alive to their responsibilities to their fellow men. FLETCHER HALE has left a record of achievement and public service which is not only a credit to his State but another example of devotion to his country, for which our Nation is noted.

But the success which marked FLETCHER HALE'S all-too-short career was not due entirely to his devotion to his public duties and his energy and purpose in serving his fellow man. He had those qualities and deeper sensibilities which marked him as one in tune with the universe, as one who sensed the joy of living, and through those attributes the understanding of the problems of his fellow man, which made him so sympathetic in his relations with friend and acquaintance alike. As one who had experienced the stern demands and knocks of daily life and the hard path of success, he could understand and assist those in need of encouragement.

As one who had experienced and enjoyed the real joy of living, he could rejoice understandingly with those who were more fortunate. A friend to all, strong in work or play, quick to understand and eager to help, sympathetic, just, or stern as occasion demanded, he typified all that is good in life. His happy smile, his friendly word were given freely, unstintingly. His good advice, his keen judgment made his words welcomed. But above all his quick understanding, his sympathetic nature, and his cheery attitude, regardless of conditions, made his a personality which brought happiness and rest to whom he contacted.

His life, in truth, was not only an example of devotion to his country but also a record of love for his fellow man. To those of us who were privileged to work with him the peculiar cheery courage that was his—that radiated from him under all circumstances—is something we can ill spare; yet his example should go before us, lighting our way, challenging us to increasing selflessness and a clearer and more consecrated patriotism.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, somehow there is special pathos in the cutting down of life right in the midst of its prime, and particularly when the life is dedicated to serious, purposeful responsibilities that confront the people of a nation. Such was the fate that overtook our late colleague, FLETCHER HALE, a Member of the House of Representatives since the Sixty-ninth Congress, a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, returning from a mission to the Interparliamentary Union, where he had gone as a representative of the American group of that organization—in the midst of great work that he was modestly carrying forward with distinction and ability our colleague was stricken.

During the nearly seven years of membership in the House of Representatives FLETCHER HALE had impressed himself upon his colleagues as a man deserving of respect, deserving of confidence, and one whose counsel and judgment must thereby be sought.

No Member of Congress can serve long in the position to which a constituency has chosen him before an appraisal of his worth and ability will have been made by his colleagues. This appraisal is made upon the basis of the everyday life and action of the Member himself. It is made through contact, through observance of the Member's deportment among his fellows, through the degree with which the Member measures his words, through candor or lack of candor, through habits of speech and action that reflect carelessness or accuracy, or that indicate studiousness and attention to the problems in hand.

During the years of my acquaintanceship with FLETCHER HALE for the most part my contact was with him as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee while I was chairman of the committee handling the naval supply bill. We understood each other; we did the closest of teamwork; we did not always agree, but we had faith each in the other, and at all times I recognized and cherished in my colleague a fine and generous soul.

My colleague did not assume a dual attitude when he labored insistently for the development of an American Navy as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee and when he labored for international understanding as a member of the Interparliamentary Union, through which the navies of the world might be reduced; rather, the two seemingly conflicting positions were in harmony.

Our colleague believed that unbridled rivalry among nations in military craft is provocative of misunderstanding and war. Therefore he sought to remove competition through understandings that could be attained at the conference table in the exchange of ideas and aspirations of world peoples. On the other hand, in the absence of that understanding which he regarded as teamwork, he stood for an American Navy equal to maintaining the needs and dignity of our great country. Imbued with this philosophy, Mr. HALE was a powerful factor for good.

The call of death came to our colleague just as he was completing the trip from the Interparliamentary Union, whose sessions had been held at Bucharest. At that conference he had striven for the development of a program that would look to the establishment of a formula under which a greater measure of teamwork would be possible among world powers and thereby a greater measure of peace and accord be attained among nations.

Others have spoken of the intimate details of the life of Mr. HALE. I have mentioned but briefly certain characteristics that appeal to me.

If I could in another word sum up qualities of our late colleague whose memory we now honor, I should include in those qualities kindliness in all his dealings, sincerity in all his purposes, loyalty to his country, and I should include courage and resolution of soul, all of which blended into that fine attitude of approach with which he undertook every responsibility intrusted to his care as a member of the House of Representatives.

HARRY M'LEARY WURZBACH

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the San Antonio Builders' Exchange memorializing the services of my predecessor, Hon. HARRY M. WURZBACH:

SAN ANTONIO BUILDERS' EXCHANGE,
San Antonio, Tex.

Resolution

Whereas the Hon. HARRY M. WURZBACH has nobly served the people of San Antonio and south Texas as citizen, statesman, and friend; and

Whereas the Hon. HARRY M. WURZBACH, ever ready to answer the call of service, has acquiesced to the final great command, leaving this body politic bereft of a stanch admirer, counselor, and champion; and

Whereas the passing of this great statesman is an irreparable loss which only time, the great alleviator, may mend: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the board of directors and membership of the San Antonio Builders' Exchange, That we express our heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved family of this beloved champion in the loss which we share with them; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the regular minutes of the records of the San Antonio Builders' Exchange in humble tribute to the achievements of the Hon. HARRY M. WURZBACH; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be extended in sympathy to the family of the Hon. HARRY M. WURZBACH and to the body of the House of Representatives of the United States Governernment, in which he so faithfully served the people of this great section.

WM. A. TURNER, President.
R. WM. ARCHER, Secretary.

Adopted at regular meeting board of directors San Antonio Builders' Exchange in meeting assembled Thursday, November 19, A. D. 1931.

I would like at this time to pay my lasting personal respects to the memory of my departed friend, HARRY M. WURZBACH. He was an able, concientious citizen, beloved by his friends, who were legion. He loved them well and served them in accord with the best that was in him while he acted as their representative.

PERCY EDWARDS QUIN

Mr. ELLZEY. Mr. Speaker, as the successor of the late PERCY E. QUIN, it is my privilege to bear testimony of the splendid record he made.

Throughout the entire seventh Mississippi congressional district PERCY QUIN was universally loved. For many years a public official, he was faithful at his post of duty. He prided himself in promptly responding to every call at the hands of his people. He was punctual and diligent in the discharge of all his duties.

PERCY QUIN was ever a loyal and stanch Democrat, and throughout his long years of public service he was a splendid leader, always advocating the Jeffersonian principles of Democracy. As I met and mingled with his many friends in the district he so ably represented, in every section I found many loyal and close personal friends of PERCY QUIN. His people loved him and forever enshrined in their hearts will be lasting and loving memories of the faithful service he rendered to his constituents.

As his successor in the Halls of Congress, I was the recipient of many courtesies because I had succeeded this beloved gentleman. Many Members from every section of the Nation have expressed to me their friendship and love for this splendid Mississippian. In truth, he was loved by Republicans and Democrats alike.

As a Member of Congress, for years Mr. QUIN was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. He worked untiringly in sponsoring legislation that would result in the operation of the Muscle Shoals plant whereby the farmers of America would secure cheaper fertilizer. One of his colleagues said that PERCY QUIN literally wore out his life in behalf of Muscle Shoals.

Another colleague informed me that he always followed PERCY QUIN in legislation that affected agriculture and labor, because these matters were on his heart, and his judgment was good.

In the hearts of his fellow countrymen long will live the memory of PERCY E. QUIN.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, when the news of the sudden passing of Hon. PERCY QUIN reached the ears of his colleagues there was a feeling of loss which crowded out all other thoughts.

"Percy," as we all called him, had the greatest insight into the effect of any piece of proposed legislation upon the masses of the people of any man in the House. It made no difference under what cloak it appeared, he was always able to measure its effect upon the "poor people." He was a safe man to follow, as his judgment was always sound.

When any vote was to be had we always knew that Percy would be found on the side of the folks as against special privilege.

Information that he was to address the House was all that we needed to fill the Chamber, and when he spoke he threw his whole energies into the effort.

PERCY QUIN was a leader, and many of his colleagues were saved from disaster by following his fine sense of justice and fair play.

He has gone, but few will ever take his place.

It is a melancholy task to lay a wreath of affection upon the grave of a departed friend. But it is fitting that we who knew him and watched with pride his brilliant career should here commemorate the many admirable qualities of that remarkably strong and attractive personality.

He was a sincere man, and an able Representative from his State, Mississippi, which has given many illustrious sons to the Nation, but none more true to his convictions than PERCY QUIN.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, PERCY EDWARDS QUIN was born October 30, 1872, on a farm in Amite County, Mississippi, and died in the city of Washington on February 4, 1932.

His sudden departure brought personal and public sorrow. Genuine regret was never before quite so universal among the people of the district ably represented by him for 20 years. His death was a distinct loss to the State and Nation.

PERCY QUIN largely worked his way through school and college, and after finishing at Gillsburg Collegiate Institute in Mississippi he was graduated from Mississippi College, Clinton, Miss., in 1893. He taught school for a year and in 1894 began the practice of law in McComb, Pike County. He was an outstanding member of the Mississippi Legislature from 1900 to 1904. On October 1, 1913, he married Miss Aylett Buckner Conner, of Natchez, one of the most charming and accomplished women of Mississippi, who survives him.

He was elected a Member of Congress from the seventh district in 1912 and was continuously thereafter reelected. He was chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, one of the powerful committees of the House, at the time of his death.

PERCY QUIN inherited a good mind. He was a keen thinker and exerted a wide influence among his fellow men. He possessed the grace of common sense to an unusual degree. He knew human nature. He grew up among the people and was familiar with the hopes and aspirations of the common man. He had a unique and delightful personality.

He knew the people of his district, and they knew and trusted him. He occupied a large place in the affections of his constituents.

As a citizen he was a patriot and devoted to his country. He endeavored to discharge the debt that all owe to both State and Nation. He was attracted to public life and was always interested in public questions and political issues. He never dodged or straddled. He was always honest and sincere. He was ever jealous of the good name of the State and was always anxious for the progress and advancement of the people of the country. As a legislator he was loyal, faithful, and industrious. He was a good judge of men, of issues, and of measures. Successful in both law and business, he was successful as a Member of Congress.

PERCY QUIN was a devoted husband. His home was the happiest spot on earth for him. His wife was the joy of his soul.

He was a true and loyal friend. He made the cause of his friends his own, and he never lost a friend except by death. His cheerful and hopeful disposition made him exceedingly companionable. He was always welcome in any group. He would go to any reasonable length to help a friend. He was devoted to his friends, and his friends were devoted to him. He was very human. We, his colleagues, treasure his memory as an affectionate friend and as a faithful public servant.

Our departed colleague gave help to the poor, sympathy to the suffering, kindness to the downcast, and hope to the discouraged. Good and true men are God's best gifts to the world, but they are more than that—they are the agents and instrumentalities for help to mankind.

PERCY QUIN came to Congress on March 4, 1913, in the prime of his manhood. He was familiar with the problems of the people and he devoted himself exclusively to the public service the 19 years that he served in Congress. No district ever had a more industrious or faithful Representative. While familiar with military affairs and while chairman of one of the greatest committees of the House, his fame likewise rests upon his advocacy of measures for the benefit of the great body of people of the country. He never forgot the farmers nor the people of his district and State. He advocated all measures for the benefit of agriculture and rural life.

PERCY QUIN was a good man, but he was not perfect. None of us is. Man does not ripen by virtues alone. If it were so, the earth would be a paradise of angels. Man is like the growth of the earth and the fruit of the seasons; he is sown in dishonor and he is matured under all varieties of heat and cold. Man ripens as a result of various and varied experiences. He is matured by the joy of spring, the warmth of summer, the winds of autumn, and the chills of winter. The good man, the great man, succeeds in spite of his mistakes and overcomes in spite of his errors.

But PERCY QUIN lived the good life of his time. He died in service. He went out in the full maturity of his powers and at his post of duty, a martyr to overwork. He was ill for awhile, but he was spared the wastes of long disease and the waiting in helpless idleness. "The set, gray life and apathetic end were spared to him." He passed away so quietly that none knew the moment of his departure.

> And could we choose the time, and choose aright,
> 'Tis best to die, our honor at the height,
> When we have done our ancestor no shame,
> But served our friends and well secured our fame.

We shall see the face of our departed colleague no more, but the light of his life and usefulness of his service will remain with us. The world is better for his having lived and wrought, and his memory, like a rare perfume whose fragrance lingers, will long be cherished. His work is done; peace to his ashes and honor to his memory.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, nearly every Member of this House knew PERCY QUIN and admired and respected him as a rugged orator, an intrepid fighter, and an indefatigable worker for the principles he championed. He was more than that. PERCY QUIN's championship of the interests of the plain man was not that quality of lip service given for his own gain, but the honest expression of his inward convictions—the bubbling forth from that inner spring of his regard for his fellow man.

The two most outstanding traits of his Christian character were his abiding faith in God and a broad sympathy for his brother man. Even before he became a Member of this body he had served in public office with the same keen understanding of the rights and problems of other people and with the same urge to alleviate those wrongs and oppressions which beset them. Never vainglorious, he spoke to measures here only when he felt a keen right and justice in his position. So clearly was this the case that his utterances were freighted with sincerity and human kindliness and carried with them the strength of a crusader's belief.

Soon after the blow fell upon him that forced him to his last sick bed, he expressed himself, not as rebellious nor impatient, but truly and humbly thankful to his Maker for sparing to him his mental faculties so that he might continue to use his influence for those he believed needed help. I never knew a man more big-hearted, more altruistic than PERCY QUIN. His life's pattern was fashioned so: "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker—

> A prince once said of a king struck down:
> "Taller he seems in death";
> And the word holds good, for now as then
> It is after death that we measure men.

It is after the passing of a public man that we take an unbiased inventory of his life's work and pass judgment upon the value of his private and public career.

Standing here "upon this bank and shoal of time" from which our distinguished colleague PERCY QUIN has passed, we pause for a moment to measure his mental and moral stature. As we do so, his proportions grow as his sterling qualities, his unblemished character, and excellent qualities of his public service are revealed.

Thomas Jefferson once said that there were only three questions to be asked of an applicant for a public office: Is he honest? Is he qualified? Is he faithful?

Measured by that standard, our distinguished colleague towers against a background of more than 20 years of service in this House. It was once said of Edmund Burke that men who did not have the patience to hear his speeches delivered invariably wore the record out reading them. The peculiar personal traits which Mr. QUIN invariably exhibited on the floor sometimes distracted the minds of Members from the real merits of his argument. But when reduced to cold type his speeches contained gems of eloquence and nuggets of wisdom that reflected a strong, overpowering intellect backed up by a conscientious conviction and an unswerving devotion to the public good.

Conscientious to an extreme degree, with a keen, incisive intellect, with supreme moral and physical courage, and with an inflexible devotion to the public weal, he rendered a service throughout his long and eventful career that will carry his name on down to the generations yet to come.

His passing was a great loss, not only to the people of his district but to the Nation as well. He literally gave his life for his country's cause. The last speech he ever made, and one which hastened his untimely taking off, was against the cancellation of the foreign debt and laying upon the backs of the already overburdened taxpayers of America $11,600,000,000, which they will have to pay if this cancellation is ever made. Every man, woman, and child under the American flag owes him a lasting debt of gratitude for that speech, from the physical effect of which he never recovered.

He is gone, but his memory will linger in these Halls for many a decade, and the effects of his public service will ever redound to the betterment of our common country.

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up,
> And say to all the world, This was a man!

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Hon. PERCY E. QUIN removed from the membership of the House one of its leaders.

For nearly 20 years he represented the seventh congressional district of Mississippi, and, having served with him for almost 10 years, I can bear testimony to his ability, his fidelity, his courage, and his devotion to duty. He loved humanity, and the cause of the poor and oppressed he always championed.

He was a Democrat not only in name but in fact. Intrenched privilege and plutocracy he abhorred and consistently and vigorously opposed. Chairman of the great Committee on Military Affairs, his life was shortened by his fight to preserve Muscle Shoals for the people of the Nation and to prevent its exploitation by selfish and sordid interests.

Earnest and aggressive, he was an able advocate, and when he spoke the House never failed to listen. He had the zeal of a crusader, and never minced his words in driving home his conviction of what he conceived to be right. He had an originality of expression and a quaintness of speech and delivery that added flavor and force to what he said. The House lost one of its most popular orators when his eloquent tongue was stilled in death.

He was a true and loyal friend, and those on both sides of the aisle honored and respected him for his honesty, integrity, and splendid attributes of character.

His devotion to his wife was beautiful, and his success, both as a man and a legislator, was doubtless due in a large measure to the fine character and helpful cooperation of this noble woman.

The State of Mississippi lost a gifted son, the Nation an able legislator, and those of us who knew and loved him a real friend when PERCY QUIN passed away.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, PERCY QUIN was loved as few men are. When the sudden news flashed to the Capitol of his untimely passing we were all grieved beyond expression.

Only the day before I had been at his bedside in the hospital and I could hardly realize that my friend had joined the "innumerable caravan." As I hurried to the hospital and there found his friends and loved ones, my thoughts were that, although his voice was silent and he would be with us no more, his memory would always be cherished, his life be an inspiration, and his character worthy of emulation.

When I first came to Congress I sought his advice and heeded his counsel, as out of his rich experience and sound judgment he was always ready, able, and willing to aid the young as well as the old.

To-day, as we pay tribute to our departed colleagues, we can truly say, "PERCY QUIN was one of God's noblemen."

He was the proud possessor of that human touch that enriched the lives of all who were fortunate enough to come in contact with him. His deep insight into the human heart, his love for his fellow man, his faith in God and in humanity, his devotion to the cause of the people, combined with many other virtues, made him a true friend and an outstanding statesman.

He could put more wisdom in fewer words than almost any man I ever knew. Many times I have heard him give expression to such characteristic and unique philosophy as—

I like the man who stands hitched whether he is tied or not.

PERCY QUIN was truly that kind of man. He was noble, true, patriotic, courageous, and could always be depended upon to put "service above self."

Mississippi has lost another illustrious son, the Nation an able statesman, and the world a real man!

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD

Mr. MOBLEY. Mr. Speaker—

Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by—
The men who are good and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat
Or hurl the cynic's ban;
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

In the fall of 1924 in the little town of Forsyth, Ga., surrounded by a host of friends of his home town and county and many of the surrounding counties, SAMUEL RUTHERFORD stood upon the platform to which he had been conducted by his friends and quoted the lines above. He had just received the Democratic nomination to Congress from the sixth congressional district of Georgia, which meant his election to this honorable body.

The friends among whom he had lived and done his life's work up to that time well knew that those lines correctly expressed the man and his feelings, as his whole life had clearly exemplified his interest in the welfare of his fellowman. First, as solicitor of the city court of Forsyth; later as a farmer, banker, and representative of the county in the State house of representatives and senate he had proven that he possessed the qualities of a good citizen. They knew his worth as a man, as a business executive, and as an officeholder. Having great confidence in him, they had exerted every effort possible to honor him with a seat in Congress which they so well knew he deserved, and which was by an overwhelming vote given him.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was born on a farm in Crawford County, Ga., May 15, 1870. During his early years he attended the public schools in the little town of Culloden, which at that time had school facilities much better than the average small community. Many of the leading men of Georgia came from Culloden and received their early training there. After attending Washington and Lee University and finishing in law at the University of Georgia Mr. RUTHERFORD moved to Forsyth, Ga., which was the county seat of the adjoining county of Monroe, where he spent the remainder of his life. I have often heard him tell of the trials of his early career, of amusing incidents that had occurred in the justice court of the county, to which his practice was almost entirely limited, due to the number of very able and active lawyers living in Forsyth at that time. However, industrious and intelligent as he was, it was only natural that he should gradually forge to the front.

He early exhibited an interest in public life and was first elected to the State legislature. Soon after that he married Miss Abigail Ponder. It has been laughingly told on him that he was first elected to office as a matter of necessity, since his election had been made the precedent to his marriage to one to whom he was deeply devoted and loved dearly. If his marriage was the result of success in his first political adventure, then surely this was the most fortunate and fruitful success of his life, for he secured a most loyal and devoted wife, one who always thought of him first and whose heart was with him in every undertaking. Mrs. Rutherford was alone with him when he was so suddenly snatched away on February 4, 1932.

As vice president of the First National Bank of Forsyth, which position he held for many years, Mr. RUTHERFORD truly exhibited the inner man. Although the farmers of his community were fairly prosperous at that time, they, as a rule, operated their farms on credit. On account of his willingness at all times to cooperate with them and because of the further fact that they found him thoroughly honest and keenly interested in their welfare, he was able to gain their friendship and admiration, which he retained through all the years. Through his association with them and his own personal experience in farming, he became fully acquainted with their many problems; and when he came to Congress his interest in agriculture and in the welfare of the farming class in this country was fully demonstrated.

One of the most beautiful traits of his character was his friendship for people. Having been in public life and politics so long, it is only natural that he might have had some enemies, but I believe he had as few as any man I have ever known. Surely it can be said of him that while a man might have been an enemy to him, he was never an enemy to anyone. His very nature revolted against carrying prejudices against his associates. I have often heard him commend people whom he had found were inclined always to have something nice to say about others rather than criticize. He granted every man the right to his own opinion; and although he might differ, he assumed that those who did not agreed with him possessed the same sincerity of purpose as he himself. He was very sympathetic, easily approached, and quickly established close and lasting friendship with those who came in contact with him. He was so kindly disposed, so lacking in guile or deception, so honest and high-minded that his friendships through the years grew in strength and number until at the time of his death he was greatly beloved by the people of his district and State.

At the time of his death he had been in Congress about seven years; and until December, 1931, the Republican Party had been in power, but at that time the Democrats organized the House and Mr. RUTHERFORD became chairman of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress. For many years Senator NORRIS had endeavored to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to change the time of meeting of Congress and to abolish the short session. The Republicans in the House had prevented the enactment of this amendment, but within a very short time after Mr. RUTHERFORD became chairman of the committee of the House, the Norris bill, as it passed the Senate, was taken up by his committee. While the committee reported the Norris resolution, it was only after having substituted the text of a bill that Mr. RUTHERFORD had introduced.

Only the day before his death he had conferred with Speaker GARNER with the view of having his bill considered in the House, but death intervened, and he did not live to see the enactment of this law.

Since coming to the Congress in 1924, Mr. RUTHERFORD had been a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. He had shown a profound knowledge of the immigration situation in this country, had always supported legislation looking toward restriction of immigration, and had only a short time before his death introduced a bill providing for further restriction, which bill was reported by the committee after his death.

His quiet and unassuming manner, his sincerity of purpose, and his freedom from demagoguery had endeared him in the hearts of his colleagues. He realized that being a Democrat under a Republican administration, very little could be accomplished by him on the floor of the House, and it is a matter of record that he never took the floor until he really had something worth while to say and when he felt that something could be accomplished. Finding this situation and desiring to be of genuine service to his district, he lost no time in directing his efforts to those who needed his services. The great work he did for the veterans of all the wars, and especially those of the Spanish-American War and World War, attracted not only the attention of his constituents but that of his colleagues in the House. Some might wonder why he gave so much of his time and devoted so much work to assisting the veterans, but when it is understood what a field of service this offered we easily realize why he interested himself in them. Through ignorance of the law and the method of procedure in the Veterans' Administration, a great majority of the veterans were not receiving that which was due them. Not only did he appear before the rating boards of the Veterans' Administration and make personal arguments in behalf of the unfortunate and disabled veterans of his district, but he gave to the Congress information which led to the correction of some of the evils of the law.

From April, 1929, until his death, I was intimately associated with Mr. RUTHERFORD as his secretary. During the sessions of Congress we had lived together in Washington, and when at home during the summer months we were associated together in the office, in canvassing the district, and I had the pleasure of accompanying him on practically every speaking engagement. I thus knew him at home, in his office, and in both public and private life. His home life was characterized by the same beautiful simplicity, sincerity, and devotion as we find in his public and official life. Although untiring in his efforts to serve others and free with his time for those who called on him, he was fond of his home and family and was most devoted to his lovely wife and two daughters. He was an upright and God-fearing citizen, possessed of a beautiful spirit and a sweet and unselfish disposition.

After his death, at the instance of his friends and mine, I became a candidate to succeed him as Representative of the sixth district of Georgia. My overwhelming election to Congress, as his successor, I must say, was due principally to the high esteem in which he was held by the people of our district. A truer demonstration of the love his people had for him could be found in the great throng that lined the streets of Forsyth to view with said hearts the passing of his remains to their final resting place. Surely such evidence of love and admiration as was exhibited on this occasion should prove a lasting consolation to his loved ones.

Truly no Representative ever commanded greater respect from his constituents than did Mr. RUTHERFORD. The sixth district of Georgia, the State of Georgia, and the whole Nation have suffered a great loss. He died at the height of his power and popularity, at his post of duty, while toiling for his fellow man, which I am sure is as he would have had it.

> And could we choose the time, and choose aright,
> 'Tis best to die, our honors at the height,
> When we have done our ancestors no shame,
> But served our friends and well secured our fame.

Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a statement by Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE, as follows:

Three times death has invaded the ranks of the Georgia delegation in the Congress of the United States during the Seventy-second session. First, in point of time, the Hon. Charles G. Edwards, of the first Georgia district, was suddenly stricken. Second, the Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, of the sixth Georgia district, and the subject of these remarks, crossed quickly the "imperceptible frontier." Third, the Hon. William J. Harris, my beloved colleague in the Senate, after a long illness, borne with singular courage and fortitude, passed into the beyond. At a later day in the Senate exercises will be held in honor of the life, character, and public service of my late colleague.

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD was born in Crawford County, Ga. Like his colleague, Congressman Edwards, he was born and reared on a farm. He was the son of William and Julia Rutherford. He attended the public schools of Crawford County, studied at Washington and Lee University, and graduated in law at the University of Georgia. He engaged in the general practice of the law. His friends and neighbors, recognizing his peculiar qualifications for public service, thrice elected him mayor of his city, subsequently electing him solicitor of his local court, and three times called him to service in the legislature of his State and to one term in the State senate from the twenty-second senatorial district of Georgia. He was also a practical business man and his energies were devoted to banking and to agriculture as well as to the practice of law. In every field of enterprise and endeavor his efforts were marked by success. He was elected to the Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congresses. In the midst of his service in the trying first session of the Seventy-second Congress, a Congress marked by fatalities in both House and Senate due to the extraordinary demands upon public officers, SAM RUTHERFORD was suddenly stricken down.

Early in life Mr. RUTHERFORD was married to Miss Abigail Ponder, who survives him. He was an ideal husband and father, and his devotion to his mother, who likewise survives him, eloquently proclaims the great tenderness and strength of his character.

In the Congress of the United States SAM RUTHERFORD was a true progressive. He did not indulge in loud speech and he held himself above the level of demagoguery. Nevertheless he believed in liberal and progressive measures. He was a stout and consistent advocate of constructive legislation. He believed in human progress. He was especially devoted to the interests of agriculture, and the veterans of all wars knew no truer friend in the Halls of Congress. The interests of his State and of his Nation were always placed above considerations personal to himself. To the people of his district, predominantly agricultural in character, he gave his first, best, and last devotion. He despised hypocrisy and cant. He was a genuine man. He liked the simple ways and habits of a sincere and honest constituency. He was content to serve. He did not court cheap publicity. He lived in the faith that honest service would be known and appreciated by those whom he loved and served.

During his first term in the Georgia Legislature, I had the pleasure of meeting SAM RUTHERFORD. From that day until the day of his death I knew him well and intimately. His whole life was wholesome, and those of us who were privileged to come within the circle of his personal friendship have the abiding confidence that we are better men from our association with him.

SAM RUTHERFORD'S colleagues in the House bear testimony to his fidelity in committee and to his fearless advocacy of the worthy cause on the floor. Yet it is of him as a man that we love to think—as a son, as a husband, and as a father. He had a character free of guile. In his heart and soul sham and pretense were strangers. He was a worthy Representative of a worthy people.

As a distinguished son of Kansas said of the great Georgia Senator, Benjamin H. Hill, I may truly say of SAM RUTHERFORD: "Of all the dead whose obsequies we have paused to solemnize in this Chamber, I recall no one whose untimely fate seems so lamentable and yet so rich in prophecy as that of SAM RUTHERFORD. He had reached the meridian of his years. He stood upon the high plateau of middle life, in that serene atmosphere where temptation no longer assails, where the clamorous passions no more distract, and where the conditions are most favorable for noble and enduring achievement."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, by death or retirement Georgia will have lost at the end of the Seventy-second Congress, during the life of that Congress, approximately half of her representation in our national lawmaking body. Their places will have been taken by men who, in the judgment of our people, are able to worthily fill their shoes; but those of us who have been accustomed to rely upon their wise counsel, seasoned by the experience of years of service, and have been bound heart-to-heart with them by the close ties of personal friendship, will sorely miss them.

Among all of our colleagues there was none who held higher place in the affections and respect of his fellows than SAMUEL RUTHERFORD. The same confidence which his constituents had in him soon communicated itself to the minds and hearts of those who came in contact with him in the performance of his official duties. No man ever questioned either his sincerity or his ability.

SAM RUTHERFORD was a specialist in his congressional work. He did not attempt to sway the Congress on every question which arose, and yet he exerted greater influence than many men who did. Active in his committee work, his influence on immigration legislation, which came from a committee of which he was a member, was probably as effective during the several years of his service as that of any Member of Congress; and there was certainly no field where wise and constructive statesmanship was more greatly needed.

Early in his congressional career he became impressed with the numerous injustices that have resulted from careless and inefficient handling of claims of World War veterans and their dependents, and with the fact that many of the most deserving of these, through lack of intelligent assistance, failed to secure rights and benefits to which they were entitled, and which others, oftentimes not so deserving, had no difficulty in obtaining. He resolved to give to these veterans and their dependents the utmost benefit that the most diligent effort on his part could secure for them. In doing so, he voluntarily assumed a tremendous burden, a burden which many Congressmen shift to the shoulders of their clerks or allow to go unattended to. He personally represented thousands of these veterans, helping them with their evidence, attending hearings, and arguing their cases, and obtaining for them hundreds of thousands of dollars in benefits they would not otherwise have received.

In addition, he was the stanch advocate on the House floor, whenever occasion demanded it, of the rights both of Spanish-American War and World War veterans.. As I have said, he was a specialist. He did not neglect his legislative duties. No Member of Congress during these years that he served has a more honorable record of legislative service than SAM RUTHERFORD, and that record, like the work that he did for his constituents, demonstrated beyond question the outstanding fact in his life—he always liked to take the side of the under dog, and his votes and his efforts were always on the side of the common people.

We shall miss him here—miss his sunny smile, his friendly greeting, as well as his wise counsel and cooperation. But we shall not miss him as much as those many thousands of people, white and black, who stood in massed lines for miles along the roadside on that February day when we carried his body through the little city where he lived to its last resting place, nor other hundreds of thousands of Georgians who could not be there, but who loved him none the less.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on the morning of February 4, 1932, the death angel invaded our ranks and took from our midst the Honorable SAMUEL RUTHERFORD. He died in the midst of his labor, like a soldier at the post of duty.

SAM RUTHERFORD was a true Georgian, a descendant of a historical Georgia family; he was a true representative of the people. He loved the people of his State and district—all of them—and he was never better satisfied than when working in their service. And that love was reciprocal, for no member of the Georgia delegation had the love and respect of his constituents more than did SAM RUTHERFORD.

The son of William and Julia Rutherford, of Forsyth, Ga., he attended the common schools of his State and received his academic college training at Washington and Lee University in the State of Virginia, whence he returned to his own State university, where he graduated in law in 1894.

Mr. RUTHERFORD's first public service was as mayor of his native city—Forsyth. He was honored with this office for three consecutive terms. His political rise was a steady march up the ladder of public service and political success. The consistency of his success and advancement was but an index of his qualifications and ability, and an appreciation for the quality and loyalty of his service. He was next made solicitor of the city court, and from there he was promoted to representative in the General Assembly of Georgia, where he served three terms, one as State senator from his senatorial district.

In 1924 the people of the sixth congressional district saw the need of his services and sent him to the Sixty-ninth Congress. He was reelected to the Seventieth, Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congress and was serving the eighth consecutive year as Representative from his district when his work was cut short.

In seeking testimonials to SAM RUTHERFORD's popularity, the seriousness of his application to duty, no matter how great or small, to his devotion to public service, to his loyalty to his country and his constituents, one needs only to go among the people of the sixth Georgia district. There the veterans of the World and other wars, the farmers, the laborers, the common people in every walk of life, the bankers, business and professional men and women of the towns and cities will all testify with a quick beating of their hearts and tears in their eyes of their love for and devotion to SAM RUTHERFORD—a true representative of his people—his memory will live forever in their hearts.

I know that no other man was closer to his people or realized their suffering and plight during these trying times more than did Mr. RUTHERFORD. It was his anxiety for their welfare, the seriousness with which he devoted himself to the problems of government in an endeavor to aid and relieve them, and the resultant strain and worry of his heavy work and efforts in their behalf that brought about his physical breakdown last summer, and finally his death in February of this year.

Dying at the age of 61 in the prime of life, at the height of his ability, usefulness, and life experience, SAM RUTHERFORD was truly a victim of this tragic era.

He was a happy man, satisfied in his life work of serving his fellow man, seeking and finding joy and peace in the bosom of his family and his people. He was prepared to meet his Maker, and prepared to answer at the judgment bar of eternity. Death being almost instantaneous, coming like a twinkling of the eye, it found him ready, for

> He had so lived that when his summons came to join
> The innumerable caravan which moves
> To that mysterious realm where each shall take
> His chamber in the silent halls of death,
> He went not, like the quarry slave at night,
> Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approached his grave
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, sad indeed was the news received on the 4th day of February last that Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, of the sixth congressional district of Georgia, had suddenly died at the Hamilton Hotel in this city.

Appearing in splendid health on the previous day, he mentioned his good physical condition and talked of the legislative program he hoped to help put over in the immediate future. In fact, he was preparing to return to the Capitol for another day's labor when the divine call came for a journey to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns."

As chairman of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, he had just reported the House resolution bearing his own name, submitting an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that after each general election of Members of the House the next session shall be organized by the newly elected Members instead of the old, as is now the case. This had long been a highly controversial question and Mr. RUTHERFORD was most happy that he was called to act so important a part in its proper solution. In a very few days after his death the resolution, still bearing his name, was taken up and passed both Houses and was signed by the President.

It will no doubt be ratified by the required number of States and become a part of the Federal Constitution. It will remain as an everlasting and most splendid monument to Mr. RUTHERFORD and Senator NORRIS, the author of the resolution in the Senate.

Mr. RUTHERFORD's death was sad in the extreme, because he was so suddenly taken away just as he was about to see, as the results of his earnest efforts, the full fruition of the greatest legislative victory that can come to any Member of either body of the Congress, the writing into the Federal Constitution of a great poplar fundamental amendment. It is given to only a very few of our Nation to write with their own hand an important, everlasting part of our people's great charter of liberty.

His death was sad not only because he already had done this great work and died just as he was receiving the acclaim of a gratified people but also because, having served comparatively so short a time, he had planned and was in the midst of an additional great legislative program on which he was working for his people.

The plans, details, and specifications were on the trestle board, the working tools were on every hand and ready, the machinery was being installed, as the master builder was called to a higher and better, everlasting service and mission. And yet, Mr. Speaker, none of the splendid service of SAMUEL RUTHERFORD is lost. God gathers up and saves for all humanity through all eternity the golden grains of such greatness and nobleness.

He was in every way a noble, splendid man. He was honest, capable, fearless, and a true representative of his people.

Mr. Speaker, during the first 12 years of my service here only two of my colleagues passed into the great beyond.

First, I went to Georgia with all that was mortal of the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, and saw him returned to mother earth at Thomson, Ga. Several years later I left in Washington in apparently good health my good friend Hon. Leslie J. Steele, of the fifth Georgia district, only a few days later to be notified of his passing and to attend his funeral at Decatur, Ga., where I saw him for the last time until the great awakening.

Now, during the last 12 months, I have been notified of the death and attended the funeral of three of my beloved colleagues.

First, Hon. Charles Gordon Edwards, of the first congressional district, who was buried in Savannah; next, Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, who was buried in Forsyth; and, last, Senator William J. Harris, who was buried recently in Cedartown.

When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions.

Three nobler, truer friends of mankind never lived. Their work is imperishable. It will last as long as yonder sun shall shine.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, SAM RUTHERFORD was my friend, and because I loved him I desire to pay this tribute, however inadequate, to his memory.

He came quietly among us, his gentle spirit moved through the Halls of Congress for but a few years, then took sudden flight to the Great Beyond, but even in so short a season his colleagues came to know and love him well. It was easy to know him and, knowing him, to love him. His nature was of such fine human and friendly quality that even at first meeting one could not regard him as a stranger. Instinctively one felt the impulse to call him "Sam."

In the House he was never assertive, but his colleagues came early to know and respect his quiet strength, to recognize his political and legislative acumen, and to rely upon his judgment.

While there was nothing aggressive about his gentle nature, he stood and fought unswervingly for the right as he saw it. He was indefatigable in his efforts for the betterment of his district and spared no pains to accomplish a just end. Thousands of World War veterans loved him and acclaimed him their champion, and thousands of his constituents mourned his passing.

SAM RUTHERFORD was a man of deeply religious conviction, a conviction his life abundantly exemplified. He was ever calm in the consciousness that a divine guidance could not lead him astray, with him it was instinctive "to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with his God."

We loved him, but God called him with "one clear call," and he went home. He has left us, but his calm influence will linger long in the memories of the many who loved him.

It was my sad privilege to attend the last sacred rites at his home in Forsyth, Ga. Rarely have I seen such overwhelming evidence of the loving affection of hosts of friends. He lay amid such floral profusion that it seemed as if the good deeds and beauty of his life had blossomed forth to pay him final tribute.

Rev. Robert L. Bivins, his friend and pastor of many years, said of him on this sad occasion:

SAM RUTHERFORD needs no eulogy at my hands. His life is more eloquent of his sterling worth than is anything that can be said about it. His life is an open book known and read of all men, and there is absolutely nothing in that book that would make him or any man ashamed.

I am sure that those who knew him best admired him most and loved him best. Doctor Chamblee has spoken of him as a tried-and-true friend, and I know that he voiced the sentiment of this vast company of people gathered here to pay this last tribute to his memory. Could you speak I know that every one of you would say, "I have lost a friend."

It has been my privilege to know SAM RUTHERFORD intimately for the past 15 years. During eight years of that time I was his pastor, and I am sure that no man and no pastor ever had a better friend. Were I to undertake to name a single trait of his character which was outstanding, I would without question say that it was his dependability. He could be depended upon in all relations of life. His word was his bond, and his life was given in the service of others. He was a man who took life's responsibilities seriously. There was nothing flippant or light in his make-up, and he gave to every task—whether great or small—his best.

As a man he was honest and upright. As a citizen he stood for righteousness. As a public servant he was conscientious and faithful. As a Christian he was genuine and sincere and without sham or hypocrisy or pretense.

He died at his post of duty, and I am sure that the influence of his life will continue to live and bless the world for all time to come. The Good Book throws light upon such a life in the wonderful statement—

"I heard a voice from Heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

The influence of SAM RUTHERFORD'S life goes on and on in the world, with ever-increasing rewards in the world to come.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most pleasant and lovable men that ever graced the Hall of Representatives was the Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD. He soon won the affection and esteem of his colleagues and discharged his official duties with efficiency and courage.

His last labors were spent upon the so-called "lame-duck" amendment to the Constitution, which passed both Houses shortly after his leaving.

It can be said of him with absolute truth that selfishness was not in him. As in private life so in his public career, the noblest altruism governed his every act. His protestations of solicitude for his people were not mere lip service; they came from the heart. Every one of his constituents had an ever-present claim upon his services. This service was rendered freely, ungrudgingly; not from any sense of obligation, personal or political, but because he loved to help and do kind deeds. "I serve" was the motto which ruled every moment of his life.

As a Member of the House of Representatives he bore himself modestly but with firm adherence to principles he had established and convictions he had formed. His voice and his vote were untrammeled. Flattery and applause he heeded little, and censure did not move him.

He was a real representative of the people of his State. His wise counsel will be missed in the House and his loss will be felt by his State and the Nation.

His name will be cherished by his friends in Washington and at home.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, as we pass through this life we find men noted for various traits of character. Some men are noted for their brilliant mental attainments, some for their ability in public speaking, some for their devotion to duty.

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD was known and loved by those who knew him for his sincerity. His constituents and his colleagues in this House had come to know that his word was as good as any bond; that you could always depend upon what he told you; that he was incapable of anything except frankness and fair play.

To lose such a man is indeed a great loss, not only to the Congress and the Nation but particularly to his friends, both here and in his district. It was such a loss that we sustained when Mr. Rutherford passed away.

It was not my privilege to know him for many years, but in the short time during which I was permitted to associate with him in this House, I came to appreciate his fine qualities and especially his sincerity.

He was not given to oratory, but was a tireless worker for his people, always dependable, always concerned for the general welfare. It is fitting that his last work in Congress brought to final enactment the "lame-duck" amendment to the Constitution. This will go down through the ages as an enduring monument to our friend and colleague.

There are thousands of veterans of the World War who have every cause to revere his memory. His efforts in their behalf were given without stint and he made no effort to capitalize his devotion to their interests.

I deeply sympathize with his family and the host of friends who mourn his passing.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, it was not a mere incident when I came to Congress in 1925 to soon form the acquaintance of Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, who was also a new Member of Congress, for he had a disposition that naturally attracted those having their first experience in the House of Representatives. In addition he seemed to have a certain studied consideration for all with whom he came in contact. He was courteous, gentle, and extremely considerate of the feelings and wishes of his friends. Upon further acquaintance I recognized him as a man of ability and discriminating judgment.

It is not surprising, therefore, that I should soon consider him a most valuable friend and would often consult him upon matters of legislative importance. Seldom did he err in drawing proper conclusions in such matters when the facts had been fully presented. He was courageous in the discharge of his every duty. He had clean, clear-cut convictions as to the obligations of a Member of Congress to his constituents, and he did not hesitate to discharge them with fidelity and honor.

As result of my close friendship, I discovered that his election to Congress was not by chance, but because of the recognition of his ability and the confidence imposed by his constituents, for he had filled various positions of honor and trust prior to being elected to Congress. He had served three consecutive terms as mayor of the city in which he lived. He was elected to his State legislature for three consecutive terms and then served in the State senate for one term, being elected to Congress immediately following.

My observation and experience since coming to Congress is that very few men, if any, are elected to this great legislative body by accident. In practically every case you will find that the Members have one or more, and very often many, outstanding accomplishments and qualifications. As a rule they are men who have demonstrated their ability and succeeded in their chosen vocations. More often they are men of a sympathetic disposition, interested in the welfare of their fellow man and anxious to contribute in any way possible to those agencies or factors designed to promote the success and happiness of mankind. SAM RUTHERFORD was not an exception. He not only possessed all of the qualifications suggested, but he was consistent day after day in his efforts to render the greatest possible service to the people of his district, who held him in the highest admiration and esteem.

In paying my humble tribute to the high and noble qualities of my friend and colleague Mr. RUTHERFORD, I do not feel like closing without saying that I consider myself fortunate in having been afforded an opportunity to be thrown so closely to his life, for I am sure that this association has been an inspiration to me in my efforts to render faithful and conscientious service to my constituents.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, SAMUEL RUTHERFORD was my friend, and for him I entertained a high regard and sincere friendship. I first knew him as a member of the Georgia Legislature in 1909, but our intimate acquaintance began when he entered Congress in 1925. Our districts adjoined, our people had similar interests, and we found much opportunity to work together. He was one of those men who live and die for an ideal and for a principle. I soon saw he was one who dedicated his life to an eternal principle and consecrated all desires, all longings, all affection, and all love upon that principle.

Mr. RUTHERFORD had begun the practice of law in the little town of Forsyth, Ga., just after graduation and admission to the bar in 1894. While law was his profession, he had banking and agricultural interests also. Forsyth is a locality where the individual studies the man who represents him in the law, in business, and legislative matters, and SAMUEL RUTHERFORD built a tremendous following by the service he rendered these people. After representing them in the capacities mentioned, he was elected to the State house of representatives, to the State senate, and later to this National Congress.

When the general assembly redistricted the State of Georgia last summer in accordance with the reapportionment law, whereby Georgia was to lose two Representatives, SAM RUTHERFORD, CARL VINSON, and I were put in a district together. Mr. RUTHERFORD was ill in a hospital at the time, but as soon as he had recovered sufficiently to take up his work, he wrote me a very lovely letter concerning "our then supposed candidacy" for Congress from the new district. If we were to seek reelection to Congress, we would necessarily have to oppose each other. Five counties from his old territory were included in the new district, whereas only four of my old ones had been left therein, with six from the old tenth, represented by Mr. VINSON. Sam wrote, "I am sending you my registered voting lists for the counties which I have, because I know you will need them * * *." Such generosity was a mere part of his nature. On several occasions he suggested that we both speak at the same meeting—if he had the invitation, he would arrange that I receive one also. No stronger evidence of unselfishness could have been manifested, and when we reflect just how much was personally involved, it is even more appreciated.

When SAMUEL RUTHERFORD'S "little journey" was abruptly terminated and he lay down his life to embark on his eternal voyage, I do not believe he went unprepared, despite the suddenness of his call. For he was a man who lived life conscientiously, pouring into each day all the vigor and beauty that emanated from his noble character. Just one month before his death a member of the Georgia delegation paid Mr. RUTHERFORD the following high tribute, as fine an indorsement as can be given any person, in my estimation. He said, "Sam's word is as good as his bond. He has never been known to go back on it."

Mr. RUTHERFORD was a gentleman of the highest type. He was not a mere politician. Instead he possessed statesmanlike qualifications, which combined with dignity and fair play won the respect of all who knew him. In truth, he builded his house of life upon the Golden Rule: "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." Surely it is fitting that we should continue to think of him in the language of that beautiful epitaph which Benjamin Franklin wrote for himself:

> The body of Benjamin Franklin, printer, like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out and stripped of its lettering and gilding, lies here food for worms; yet the work itself shall not be lost, for it will, as he believed, appear once more in a new and more beautiful edition, corrected and amended by the Author.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay honor to the memory of our colleague and my fellow committeeman, the gentleman from Georgia, Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD.

Shortly after he was seated as a Member of this House of Representatives I was one of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to greet him upon his election to membership on that important committee, and from that time until his untimely death we stayed side by side in seats next to each other at the table of that rather controversial committee.

During the time we sat together on the minority side of the committee table, Mr. RUTHERFORD impressed me with his legal and legislative ability, with his understanding of the human elements involved in subjects incorporated in bills considered by our committee, and with his sincerity of purpose to do what he could to legislate wisely.

We advanced together in succeeding sessions and Congresses toward ranking positions on the Democratic side of the committee table, sharing the small successes and the setbacks of minority Members through the Seventy-first Congress, and I grew to respect his cooperation and his judgment on all matters which involved the human justices in our restrictive immigration policy.

When the current session of the Seventy-second Congress opened, and I was honored with the Democratic chairmanship of this committee. I felt encouraged by the thought that my arduous duties as chairman would carry also sympathetic, and just cooperation from Mr. RUTHERFORD sitting at my side as the ranking Democratic member of the committee.

While we labored together on the majority side of our committee from the middle of December, 1931, through January, 1932, and indeed up to the evening of February 3, 1932, I continued to feel his cooperation in solving the inconsistencies and the inhuman features of immigration restriction and the maintenance of just naturalization measures.

In fact, the untimely death of Mr. RUTHERFORD prevented the consideration of a bill which he had introduced and upon which this committee had set a date for a public hearing, and I was shocked beyond expression when informed that he had died suddenly on the morning of February 4. Just the night before, we had conversed regarding the humane and highly desirable features of the bill we were about to consider in committee.

In retrospect, I can not help but feel that the sudden taking from our midst of our colleague, SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, almost at the peak of his career, has deprived our committee of a wise counselor, this House of a constructive legislator, his native State of a logical Representative in the National Legislature, his host of friends wherever his activities had taken him a sympathetic confidant and advisor, and his more intimate friends and nearest relatives a companion and inspiration in every-day contacts and activities.

In closing, may I trust those members of his innermost home circle may be consoled by the consciousness that SAMUEL RUTHERFORD has left behind with them a heritage of honorable service to his profession, to his city, to his State, to his Nation, to his friends, and to his family, and that his death found him in the midst of duty not yet completed and still striving toward accomplishments hoped for.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it would do violence to my tenderest emotions and sentiments and the best instincts of my nature if I should allow this opportunity to pass without paying a tribute to my departed friend Hon. SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, who so ably and acceptably represented the sixth congressional district of Georgia from the time of his election to the Sixty-ninth Congress to the date of his untimely passing.

He was tender-hearted, affable, and genial, and loved his fellow man. He was never happier than when rendering them effective and real service. Many pages might be occupied in recounting his charitable acts and deeds of kindness and helpfulness.

He was a civic leader and deeply interested in the advancement and well-being of his city, county, State, and country. He was also a tower of strength in his church and in the realm of true Christian religion. He always displayed a keen interest in political affairs; served his city as mayor for three consecutive terms; was solicitor of the city court of his county; was three times elected to the Legislature of Georgia, and served one term as State senator from the twenty-second district of Georgia.

He was a lawyer of pronounced ability and made his clients' cause his own.

He had great sympathy for the ex-service men of the World War, as well as the veterans of all our wars, and perhaps no Member who ever served in Congress from Georgia was more untiring in his efforts in the aid of these veterans and their dependents and accomplished more for them.

One of his notable achievements during his service in Congress was the passage, just before his death, of a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress. This was essentially the Rutherford resolution, and he ably championed it and it was under his leadership it was passed.

In the death of my friend his community, district, State, and Nation have sustained a distinct loss.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not like this session of the Congress to pass without writing into the permanent RECORD something of the personal appreciation and esteem that I held for my devoted friend the late SAMUEL RUTHERFORD of Georgia. We came here as Members of the Sixty-ninth Congress and served together continuously up until the beginning of the present session, when he was suddenly and unexpectedly taken away. To me his death meant more than the passing of the ordinary or casual friend, for there was nothing of the ordinary or casual in the friendship that we had formed. He was probably my most intimate associate in this splendid group of men, and I grieve that the bond of love that bound us together had to be broken and that he had to surrender the commission which the people of his congressional district had proudfully and repeatedly given him and which he faithfully sought to merit and did merit by giving himself to the public service without stint and without limit.

Death overtook him in the prime of life and in the midst of the performance of his arduous labors, but not before he had made a record of which any man might well be proud. He loved his country and all that has made it great, but his chief concern was in the shaping of public laws in such manner as to insure equal justice for all, the raising of the obscure and underprivileged to the level of joint participation in the benefits of government.

He came here well prepared for congressional service. His interest in life had been varied. As a lawyer, banker, farmer, and legislator his splendid talents were well experienced and disciplined and these he devoted with great zeal to the public business of the country with resultant good to the common mass of men.

Early in his service he became the outstanding champion of the cause of the veteran and his family. Not that he sought to impose upon the country any unjustifiable and unbearable burden, but that he demanded that justice should be the portion of all. And in this behalf he promoted many changes which broadened and liberalized all veteran legislation. For this work he won the plaudits of his colleagues and the country and will be ever remembered with a feeling of deepest affection by the soldier and his dependents everywhere.

By nature he was generous, gentle, and forgiving, but in the prosecution of undoubted wrong he was militant and uncompromising. His friends were legion—all who knew him loved him. As a clean and high-minded Christian he daily practiced his religion in the doing of countless deeds of good. There was not a vestige of meanness in his make-up, no envy, no malice, but a sympathy and affection for all. He was a cultured gentleman, a devoted husband and father, a sincere friend, and a loyal servant of the people. He was a man who made life better at every point where he touched it. In his death his country lost one upon whose unerring opinion and well-seasoned judgment it could well depend. May his sweet tolerance and kindly nature be long remembered, and the influence of his exemplary life go marching on.

ALBERT HENRY VESTAL

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in the untimely death of ALBERT H. VESTAL the State of Indiana has lost a distinguished son. The Nation has been deprived of a capable and courageous public servant.

Congressman VESTAL was a typical American. Reared on a farm, he became at an early age a steel worker in order to more rapidly obtain funds for his education. He completed a university course and was admitted to the practice of law at 21 years of age. Marked ability and hard work soon placed him in front rank with Indiana's best lawyers. Before he was 30 he had three times been elected a district attorney in Indiana. Eight times he was elected to the Congress of the United States.

Our colleague merited and enjoyed the confidence of everyone. In the House of Representatives his ability was quickly recognized by his associates. He was repeatedly elected whip of his party without opposition. As chairman of an important committee, he was the author of extensive legislation of national significance.

He served his constituency with vigorous devotion. No request was too small to receive his personal attention. His energetic work, his fine moral character, his characteristic genius for friendship have given him a permanent place in the affection and memory of his colleagues.

We are proud indeed to have been associated in service with him. His singleness of patriotic purpose will ever spur us on to a greater and nobler effort.

What an unknown poet has said may well apply to Congressman VESTAL.

The period of life is brief;
'Tis the red of the red rose leaf;
'Tis the gold of the sunset sky;
'Tis the flight of the bird on high.
Yet one may fill that space
With such an infinite grace
That the red will tinge all time,
And the gold throughout the ages shine;
And the flight of the bird will be swift and straight
To the portals of God's own gate.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of our former colleague ALBERT H. VESTAL this House has lost one of its most beloved and valuable Members. His death leaves a vacant place in the State of his nativity and in the hearts of his friends that can never be filled. His popularity was not confined to the members of his own party but was general. The high esteem in which he was held by all Members, regardless of party, was richly deserved because of the fair and friendly manner in which he met, without exception, his many duties. I dare say no Member of the House during his service had more real genuine friends than BERT VESTAL.

He served with distinction and signal effectiveness for many years as his party's whip. Although that purely political office frequently necessitated sharp clashes with the opposition party, he always so conducted himself and his office as to leave no feeling of personal animosity.

Not only has this House lost a valuable Member, but his district, State, and Nation have lost a faithful public servant. There are, of course, varying degrees of service rendered by Members here, but I believe it can be truthfully said that no district in the United States was better represented than his. No man in the House, during his service, gave more unselfish attention to the demands of his constituents than he. No matter was too small, no constituent too insignificant to swerve him from his known policy of giving personal attention to every matter brought to his office by the people of his district. It was this constant application to duty and his desire to take care of the multitude of demands made upon him that contributed largely to his untimely death. BERT VESTAL died in the service of his country just as much as if he had fallen upon the field of battle. He was not only devoted to the people and the interests of his district and State, but he was in like measure and with equal fidelity devoted to his country. Those who come after him, however capable they may be, will find in his record a high standard to excel.

To me his death meant more than the loss of a colleague. He was my personal friend. Our districts in Indiana not only joined, but we entered Congress together in 1917 and served together continuously until his death. My almost daily contact with him during that period gave me a true insight into his character. I was always proud to claim him as a friend and delighted to share with him the innumerable troubles and worries incident to our jobs about which, unfortunately, our constituents know little. His genial personality and radiant optimism often helped to smooth out what seemed to be unsurmountable barriers. His service was an inspiration to us all and will remain as a pleasant memory forever.

I join with his colleagues in expressing to his family, as well as the good people of his district, the sorrow and sympathy which we all feel. They can take comfort in the fact that he performed with fidelity and devotion that which it was given him to do. While he is no longer with us in person, he will remain with us in memory and spirit as long as we are permitted to live.

Mr. LARRABEE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of our deceased colleague Hon. ALBERT H. VESTAL, of Indiana.

In the death of Hon. ALBERT H. VESTAL his State and Nation have lost a patriotic and loyal public servant, his district a conscientious and tireless worker, his family a devoted husband and father.

I can not say, I will not say,
That he is dead—he is just away!
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand,
He has wandered into an unknown land.

And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be since he lingers there.
And you—oh you, who the wildest yearn
For the old-time step and the glad return.

Think of him faring on, as dear
In the love of there, as the love of here.
Think of him as the same, I say,
He is not dead—he is just away.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. ALBERT H. VESTAL, of Indiana, the Nation lost a great and good man. For eight terms he served the people of the eighth district of Indiana with fidelity and distinction. He was loved, respected, and esteemed by his colleagues. A fearless and able fighter for every worthy and just cause, he was at all times fair and courteous to those who opposed or differed with him. He was unremitting in his toil for those whom he had the honor to represent; the soldiers, the toiling masses, the unfortunate, the widows and orphans, and every child had in him a true and loyal friend.

"Bert," as he was affectionately called by his colleagues and his constituents, was a man of perpetual sunshine and good cheer; he was a man among men and a boy among boys. These charms, coupled with unusual ability, made him a leader and placed upon his shoulders heavy legislative burdens and responsibilities. His legislative record is one of conspicuous achievement. The Nation can ill afford to lose the influence and service of such a man in public life.

Much as we his colleagues miss him and mourn his loss, we rejoice that he left to his Nation, to his State, and to his family the priceless heritage of a good character and a good name.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, in the death of ALBERT H. VESTAL, late a Representative of the State of Indiana, the country lost a devoted servant and I one of my dearest friends.

I leave to his colleagues from Indiana the task of detailing his public service.

For several years Mr. VESTAL served as Republican whip in the House of Representatives. No new Member arrived here without appreciating the kindly and courteous way in which he was treated by Mr. VESTAL. I know from experience and observation that he attracted men to him and inspired confidence wherever he went.

Mrs. Burtness and I have been entertained in the home of Mr. VESTAL and his splendid wife at Anderson, Ind. There they were both loved by their neighbors just as they were in congressional circles in Washington. This is not strange, for none could be more hospitable, more friendly, or more helpful in time of need. They never considered their own comfort or convenience when there was an opportunity to serve others.

Mr. VESTAL was devoted to his wife and two children. To them the hearts of a legion of friends overflowed with loving sympathy in their sudden bereavement. They have the comfort not only of knowing that as a citizen he served well his community, State, and country but also a host of the finest recollections of him as an ideal husband and father.

On Sunday, April 3, 1932, we laid away his mortal remains in the soil of the State of Indiana which he so dearly loved. The beautiful and impressive tribute paid him by thousands of neighbors, friends, constituents, colleagues, and men and women in official life in the State and Nation was a scene

I shall never forget. It will always remain an inspiration to those who witnessed it to render, as he did, faithful and conscientious service.

Blessed be his memory.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I came to Congress the same year as our late colleague, Hon. ALBERT H. VESTAL. Shortly our acquaintance ripened into a friendship which these years of contact in and out of Congress cemented into confidence and affection. We had 15 years of friendly contact without a jarring note and, so far as I know, without an ill wish to mar the memory of that friendship.

BERT VESTAL, as we all preferred to call him, was a good Congressman. He was loyal to his people. He had a commendable sense of responsibility to his country; a desire to serve her best interests. He was attentive to his duties. He measured those duties with a keen, wholesome judgment with which a life of broad contacts and, above all, a thoroughly human sympathy had endowed him.

This is not the place for presentation of the details of his work in Congress. The printed page can give no adequate portrayal of the good, wholesome character and qualities of BERT VESTAL. Those qualities will be fully appreciated only by those who knew him by contact and who shared his confidence and friendship.

A man may be a good Congressman and well serve his country and thus deserve the appreciation of his fellow men, but that career would be in vain without the qualities that establish him as a real man among his fellows. Our colleague had the qualities that bring out our most cherished commendation. To an unusual degree he was sincere in all his relations, political and personal. Loyalty to his friends was as natural to him as his own existence. His heart responded in sympathy to every misfortune. An injustice or wrongdoing, particularly to the weak and helpless, would instinctively bring his most courageous opposition and condemnation.

An important part of the life of BERT VESTAL was the sympathy, understanding, companionship, and affection of his splendid wife, who so wonderfully shared his life in all its phases and gained with him a place in the affection of all his friends.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I shall not dwell on the distinguished public service to his constituents and to the country of my late colleague and friend the Hon. ALBERT H. VESTAL; nor shall I speak of his valuable contributions to the success of his political party and mine, the Republican organization, as a campaigner in hard battles, or as the whip of his party in the House. Neither shall I refer, except in passing, to his delightful personal charm as an entertainer, or even as a performer of merit when he gave his friends ample proof of his histrionic ability. Those and many other excellencies were his possession, acquired by toil, talent, and industry. He was scholar, lawyer, and statesman, and achieved an honorable public career. My main purpose, however, in this brief eulogy is to pay tribute to BERT VESTAL as a friend, a comrade, an associate, whose loyalty and devotion and steadfast allegiance to person and principle were outstanding characteristics. He was one of my early friends in the House, and I was greatly grieved by his sudden death. I cherish his memory, and tender deepest sympathy to his widow and children.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, when ALBERT H. VESTAL passed on, this body lost a valuable and useful Member, the State of Indiana an able and dependable statesman, and the city of Anderson, Ind., one of its most able and beloved citizens.

It is with deep feeling of sorrow and keen sense of regret that I endeavor to pay a tribute of admiration and respect to the memory of my friend, ALBERT H. VESTAL. For him I entertained a high regard and sincere friendship.

"Bert" as we intimately and affectionately knew him, was ever at the command of his friends and colleagues when opportunity offered to lend a helping hand or to do a kindly deed. He was known and loved by those who knew him for his honesty and sincerity. His constituents and his colleagues in the House had come to know that his word was as good as any bond; that you could always depend upon what he told you, and that he would stand for nothing but frankness and fair play.

BERT VESTAL knew farm conditions, as he was born and reared on a farm; he knew the needs of the laboring men, as he had been one of them, having in his younger days worked in the steel mills and factories; he knew the desires of the professional and business men, as he was a lawyer and a business man.

I class BERT VESTAL as one of the most typical examples of a successful citizen with whom it has been my good fortune to be associated. He was a poor country lad, dependent upon his own efforts to obtain an education. He worked his way through college and studied law under adverse conditions and under financial limitations. His early training and experience made it possible for him to develop into one of the most useful Members of the House. His great wealth of information, his profound knowledge of legal principles, his strong and logical intellect and superb powers for the presentation of his views gave him unusual advantage in the discussion and consideration of problems of national import. He had pronounced views on all great public questions and always had the courage to express them.

There is little I can add to the words of tribute expressed by others. My appreciation of BERT VESTAL'S ability, his genial, buoyant nature, his love of his fellows, and his understanding of their problems is probably only what all have sensed. In his passing we have lost a tried and lovable friend, and yet in the knowledge of that loss is there not a feeling of deep gratitude and appreciation that we have been privileged to have known such a man?

Bert still lives and will continue to live in the memory of his many friends and, I am sure, is in restful peace in the world beyond.

I deeply sympathize with his family and the host of friends who mourn his passing.

EDWARD M'MATH BEERS

Mr. DOUTRICH. Mr. Speaker, the lamented passing of our colleague, EDWARD M. BEERS, was a distinct shock to everybody who knew him. He was a most active and effective worker and a citizen of distinction in his State.

Mr. BEERS, early in life, learned the need for industry. He soon discovered that success came from work—that work was one of the essential needs of those who would succeed, and he devoted himself to the task of becoming a success. We all know that he did succeed.

He was a benefactor for the good his benefactions did to those who received them and not for the publicity which he might receive as the result thereof. He lived to do things for the public and for the people he liked. His word was always kept. If he believed in a thing he did it. He did not enter into arguments as to why he did it or why he refused to do it. He was a public servant in the truest sense. He was not in public life because he wanted additional power—he was in the service because he wanted to serve. The key to his life and character was his devotion to service. In his public and private life he served others unselfishly. As a Member of the House he served well and faithfully those whom he represented.

A sense of humor is always a happy virtue for anyone in public life. Mr. BEERS was blessed with a sense of humor that made it always a pleasure to be with him.

Mr. BEERS was a good man; he was a charitable man; he was an able and wise man; and possessed many elements of true greatness; and the country, as well as the State of Pennsylvania, has suffered a severe loss in his passing.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. EDWARD M. BEERS filled a place in the House of Representatives with fidelity, intelligence, and industry for nearly nine years.

It was my good fortune to serve on the Committee on Printing with him during all of that period; and the large discretionary powers which that committee, in conjunction with the Printing Committee of the Senate in what is known as the Joint Committee on Printing, possesses, is an invitation to dictatorial exercise of power, which is always a true test of a man's character.

During that service a spirit of fairness was always displayed by Mr. BEERS and the zealous record he held for the rights of people having business with the committee and the consideration, in particular, he always showed for the rights of the employees of the Government Printing Office, always impressed me not only with the fundamental honesty and humanity of Mr. BEERS but with his loyal support of the principles of the Master whom he professed and unostentatiously served, believing that the highest duty of man is to do unto others as you would they should do unto you.

His death is a loss to this House and to his State and was a peculiar affliction to myself and to those closely associated with him.

His personal character was above reproach. Even in the heat of strenuous campaigns there were never any aspersions cast tending to reflect on his character or integrity. His family life was most beautiful and was not marred by a single shadow.

He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and not only took an active part in all church affairs but also showed his faith in his life and the work that he did. He had an abiding faith in the triumph of goodness, and believed not so much in the punishment of evil as in its final elimination from human lives and the realization of the highest and noblest destiny both of the individual and the human race. He believed that—

Religion is a necessary, an indispensable element in any great human character.

And held that—

Dim as the borrowed beams of moon and stars
To lonely, weary, wandering travelers,
Is reason to the soul; and as on high
Those rolling fires discover but the sky,
Not light us here; so reason's glimmering ray
Was lent, not to assure our doubtful way,
But guide us upward to a better day.
And as those mighty tapers disappear
When day's bright lord ascends the hemisphere,
So pale grows reason at religion's sight;
So dies, and so dissolves in supernatural light.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a brief tribute to Judge EDWARD M. BEERS, late a Representative from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

This beautiful tribute comes from the Bolgiano Bible Class of Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., of which Mr. BEERS was a regular and devoted attendant when in the Capital.

EDWARD M. BEERS

The members of the Bolgiano Class of Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church miss Brother EDWARD M. BEERS, whom God—in His all-wise judgment—has seen fit to call home.

We pause in profound sorrow to-day as we realize that Brother BEERS is no longer with us. We miss the warmth and cheer of his greeting—his friendly handclasp—his pleasant smile—his voice in prayer and song—his words of inspiration.

A great man has left our midst.

He was great because he stood squarely for the highest and noblest things in life.

He was great because he was a man of courage and conviction.

He was great because he was a man of broad and sympathetic understanding.

He was great because he achieved an honored and respected voice in the counsel of our Nation.

He was great because he commanded the instant admiration and respect of all who met him.

Brother EDWARD M. BEERS was born May 23, 1877, near Nossville, Pa. He died in Washington, D. C., April 21, 1932. His early childhood was spent on his father's farm. When he was 12 years old his family moved to Mount Union, Pa., where his father became the owner of a hotel which Brother BEERS later managed.

EDWARD BEERS came of Christian parents. He grew up in the church of God, always active in religious affairs. For many years he was superintendent of the Sunday school of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Mount Union and also served on the official board of that church.

He was widely known among Methodists throughout Pennsylvania. He was one of the promoters of the Methodist Training Camp at Newton Hamilton and was a member of its board of directors. At the time of his death he was its president.

He served as associate judge of Huntingdon County, Pa., for nine years. He had the great distinction of being elected judge without his name appearing on the printed ballot.

He was vice president of the First National Bank of Mount Union and was a director of the Grange Trust Co. of Huntingdon.

In 1922 he was elected to Congress and was reelected four successive times.

His fellow men put their faith in him because they could not do otherwise. His very nature made people love him, and depend upon him.

In Dr. Frank W. Collier's teachings, he found many things which satisfied his heart and mind, and which touched him deeply.

Brother BEERS is missed—and will be missed still more as time goes by.

The Nation will miss him, particularly in this hour of anxiety and distress. The communities in which he moved will miss him. And we ourselves shall miss him in the days to come.

Not for him do we sorrow, because his is a rich reward attained, but we sorrow for ourselves that we can not longer have him with us.

To his loved ones, who will miss him as no one else possibly can, our hearts go out in deepest sympathy, and we pray that the influence of his spiritual life may comfort those who mourn, and that they, with faith like his, may "trace the rainbow through the rain," and see the promise of the resurrection through their tears.

"Christ arose! and, because He lives, we too shall live."

Be it resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Edward M. Beers, that a copy be spread on the records of the Bolgiano Class, and a copy on the records of the official board of Foundry Church.

By the Bolgiano Class of Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church.

ART BROWN,
LOUIS W. MATTERN,
FRANK E. BEST,
Committee.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1932.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, again the angel of death has taken from our midst a good father, a dutiful husband, and a friend to all mankind. The Hon. EDWARD M. BEERS was one of the finest of men—loved and esteemed by all who knew him—honorable, upright, sincere, and conscientious, attending to his duties in Congress and elsewhere in the best possible manner.

He had the greatest concern and interest in those things in life that were vital to the welfare of his friends and to the general good of his country. He took great interest in the work assigned to him in Congress, on committees and on the floor of the House. The Hon. EDWARD M. BEERS represented the eighteenth Pennsylvania district, known as the shoestring district, for five consecutive terms. He gave undivided attention to his committee work and to legislation on the floor of the House. He became chairman of the Committee on Printing of the House and rendered excellent service to that committee; he was appointed vice chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing in 1930 and served on these committees until his death.

He was extremely interested in his church, in the Sunday school, and many times did he talk to me about the work of the men's Bible class and the pleasure and enjoyment he received in attending this class meeting every Sunday morning. He was a firm believer in that Golden Rule laid down for us all, "Do unto others as ye would that men should do unto you," and I believe he practiced it as well as any man could.

The host of friends who mourned his departure rejoice in the fact that he lived such an honest, clean, Christian life that we realize he is now at home in the heavenly land where his pleasures and joys abound in greatest glory. His life is a monument to us all, to emulate his great deeds and acts that we may reap that harvest of undying joy and happiness when we are summoned to that Great Beyond.

While we here in this world shall miss him, we know that our loss is his gain, our sorrow for his departure is joy to the angels in heaven, and while we go about our daily tasks we realize our lives have been enriched by his association; our joys have been increased by mingling with him. He will always linger in our memory as a true friend and brother.

Sleep on, dear friends, such lives as thine
Have not been lived in vain,
But shed an influence, rare, divine,
On lives that here remain.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. EDWARD M. BEERS, the Pennsylvania delegation suffered a deep loss.

For almost a decade Representative BEERS served his district, his State, and his Nation in this hall, representing a proud agricultural district. His constituents knew him as their friend, and he knew them in their many and varied interests and was ever willing and untiring in his efforts to serve them.

Much that is great and noble can be said of his public services, but high above all this, which is more beautiful and more enduring, it can be said that Mr. Beers was truly a good man and a Christian. Well may the youth of his district and of the world emulate the example which was set for them by this great and good man.

He believed that in the moral order men should live without hindering the lives of others, should live to aid others in attaining more complete life, and that a day will come when the individual will be blessed in "hand and foot and soul four-square, fashioned without fault," fit closely into the moral order as the perfect ashlar.

He was a loyal friend, a loving husband, a kind father, and an energetic, conscientious man possessed of high ideals and of deep religious purpose. His accomplishments on earth were wrought in strength and honor. His memory will be cherished by his colleagues and friends.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, although all of us realize the certainty of death, every time a final summons comes our hearts are filled with sadness. Particularly is this true when the flag on the Capitol is at half-mast in mute evidence of the passing of another public servant.

In the recent death of our colleague, Hon. EDWARD M. BEERS, I lost a good personal friend, his district lost a painstaking and noteworthy Representative, his State and country a patriotic and loyal public servant, and his family a loving and faithful husband and father. Personally, I had the highest regard for Mr. BEERS, and am happy to have had the privilege of associating and laboring with him.

It may truly be said that our late colleague entered upon his duties with unusual zeal and earnestness, giving his best efforts to every task. As a consequence his talents were recognized early in his congressional career; and although his service with us covered a period of less than eight years, he had attained a position of vast influence and his counsel and advice were frequently sought by his associates.

Congressman BEERS was devoted to the interests of his constituency, and those of us who attended his funeral at Mount Union will never forget the efforts of his great host of friends and constituents to pay honor in their last tribute to a dear friend and public servant.

While ED BEERS has embarked on that journey from which none return, and his legion of friends and admirers will greatly miss him, the memory of his public service and notable accomplishments in his comparatively short career will ever be a priceless heritage to his family and friends.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, early in my first term as a Representative I became acquainted with Congressman EDWARD M. BEERS. He represented the district in Pennsylvania in which my father was born and in which, with the exception of three years, my mother spent her girlhood and young womanhood. This formed a tie that led to a warm and lasting friendship which I enjoyed to the time of his untimely death. He was a man of such powerful physical development and seeming perfection of health that his death caused great surprise mingled with profound sorrow and regret among all his congressional friends.

I was particularly fond of Mr. BEERS, having lived for years at the same hotel and having been his golf partner in many fondly remembered games during the recent years. I have known few men who enjoyed life with more zest than this whole-souled Pennsylvanian. It was a joy to be with him, with all his exuberance of life and good nature. In all my experience with him, in play, in the forum, and on the street, I have never seen him with patience exhausted or his temper stirred to heat or anger. He lived a fine and useful life, and his place in the community, in his State, and in his Nation will not be easily filled.

His family life was ideal, and he left to wife and son a beautiful memory and a rich heritage in his honorable and exemplary life. He took an active and important part in the social, church, and business life of his community. He liked folks and enjoyed the association with his friends, with whom he was always popular and toward whom he always extended the most sympathetic attention. He held a high place in the estimation and affection of his colleagues and was a consistent and arduous worker on the committees on which he served. He was a Representative of high rank and he served his district and his State with distinction and honor. He occupied an exalted position in the estimation of his constituency, whom he served with consecrated devotion. His people will miss his broad-visioned statesmanship and untiring devotion to duty. To that long line of distinguished men whom Pennsylvania has contributed to the service of the Nation EDWARD M. BEERS will add luster.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, one of our colleagues, the Hon. EDWARD C. BEERS, has gone. He was loved and respected by all who knew him. If I should write a thousand pages in which I should attempt to draw the picture of his beautiful life, I could not do justice to the full kindness of his overflowing heart. He loved mankind. His ambition in life was to serve his fellow man, and that very service which he extended to his colleagues, his constituents, and his friends undoubtedly shortened the days of his life.

A poet whose life must have been imbued with that sweet sentiment toward the passing world was surely thinking of humanity and his more unfortunate, footsore, and weary brethren in the same spirit in which EDWARD M. BEERS always thought of them when he wrote that beautiful poem:

Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by—
These men who are good and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat
Or hurl the cynic's ban—
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

ED BEERS and I came to Congress at the same time. We counseled with one another and I drew from my association with him many helpful and strengthening ideals of life. He was the soul of courtesy, accommodation, and kindness, yet calm, collected, and courageous.

His quiet and unassuming manner, his generosity to those who disagreed with him, and his entire freedom from all that was superficial or false characterized him in the full light of the true man which he was and endeared him to his colleagues in Congress.

At the time of his death he could not have been loved more. His strength of character was unbounded, his opinion was sought, his record in Congress enviable. He died at his post of duty at the hour when the world needed him most. It is strange. We can not fathom his early departure. His record stands unmarred. The story of his life is an inspiration and a guidepost to ambitious young men—

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they while their companions slept
Were toiling upward in the night.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, at 1 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m., the House was called to order by the Speaker.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUCKBEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a statement from the mayor of the city of Rockford and a resolution from the city council of that city on the economic situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution recently adopted by the Northwestern Retail Dealers Association in opposition to the inland waterway-development project at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RIVER AND HARBOR DEVELOPMENT

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, for the information of the Members of the House, a statement that has been furnished me by Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers of the War Department, showing the estimated cost of building river and harbor projects authorized by Congress, which are fully justifiable at the present time in the interest of commerce and navigation.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Congress may decide to enlarge its relief program and authorize the appropriation of additional money for the relief of agriculture and for the completion of revenue-producing public works in order to relieve as far as possible the unemployment situation that is rapidly becoming a menace throughout the Nation. If such a program should be sponsored by the Congress, I know of no project that would afford as great employment of labor, dollar for dollar, as would the completion of the work that has been authorized for the rivers and harbors system, and I know of nothing that the Government could do that would bring about more immediate relief for agriculture and kindred industries than the completion of the inland-waterway system.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. Does not the gentleman think that development of the inland-waterway system at this time will further destroy the jobs of railroaders?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I think it will help jobs 100 per cent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, May 25, 1932.

Hon. W. E. HULL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HULL: In accordance with your request I take pleasure in furnishing you with a copy of the statement showing the estimated cost of completing river and harbor projects authorized by Congress, which are fully justified at the present time in the interests of commerce and navigation, as presented to the subcommittee of the Commerce Committee of the United States Senate in a hearing of April 9, 1932. You will note that these projects total approximately $197,000,000.

In addition to the projects shown on these lists the following important projects have been authorized by Congress, for which the full appropriation necessary for completion has not been authorized.

	Total estimated cost	Authorized appropriation	Amount remaining to be authorized
Mississippi River	$124,000,000	$7,500,000	$116,500,000
Tennessee River	74,700,000	5,000,000	69,700,000
Miami Harbor	885,000	200,000	685,000
Missouri River, Kansas City to Sioux City	53,750,000	27,000,000	26,750,000
Total			213,635,000

This statement does not include the Connecticut River, Hartford to Holyoke, now under review under committee resolution.

Sincerely yours,

LYTLE BROWN,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to present the distinguished-flying cross to Amelia Earhart Putnam.

FEDERAL RELIEF

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, at this time, right after the gentleman has called attention to the letter of General Brown with reference to public works, I rise to call the attention of the House to the fact that on January 19, of this year, the Committee on Labor, of which I have the honor to be chairman, reported to the House a bill calling for $700,000,000 for Federal relief; $500,000,000 of that was to be for loans to the States. The States were to put up their bonds, notes, or debentures as security and were to be given 10 years to pay the money back. If they did not pay it back at that time, it was to be taken out of the Federal highway contributions at the rate of one-tenth of the Federal highway appropriation per year. Two hundred million dollars was to be spent for projects already allocated on public works for which no appropriation had been made. My idea at this time in calling this to the attention of the House is because I want the House to know that the Committee on Labor was on the job over five months ago in reference to Federal relief. We considered the Huddleston bill, which calls for $100,000,000 direct Federal relief, and the Lewis bill which calls for $375,000,000. Finally, the Committee on Labor reported out the Connery $700,000,000 bill. We went to the Rules Committee and were supported by the entire organized labor of the United States, all of the railroad labor organizations, the American Federation of Labor, and all labor organizations in the country in asking Congress to take action on this bill.

The Rules Committee did not give us a rule. I call this to the attention of the House without any bitterness or any criticism particularly of the Committee on Rules, but in order to let the House know, as I say, that the Committee on Labor was on the job five months ago. I am happy at this time to see that Members of the other body and that the Speaker of this House have taken up the matter, and that the Speaker of the House has introduced a bill which is going to call for Federal relief. I am in favor of any bill which will bring relief for the people. We have been taking care of the bankers, the international bankers, and the big interests in the United States, and it is about time that we took care of the starving men, women, and children in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that to-morrow evening we are going to have a meeting in the House Office Building, at which time and place we will hear from the President of the American Federation of Labor, the head of the Grange, and an expert economist on the need of legislation such as the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. CONNERY. I shall be glad to attend that meeting. In conclusion I wish to say I am happy to favor any legislation which will bring relief. We find William Randolph Hearst through his papers suggesting a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan. I am in favor of that proposition, which would do much to take care of the people, those who are out of work and hungry and in need. Of course, my personal belief is that the first $2,000,000,000 should be used to pay the soldiers' bonus, for they were the ones who saved the country billions of dollars and are now in need of help from the Government for which they fought. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

KENT v. COYLE

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the report of the committee in the contested-election case of Kent v. Coyle.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the report of the Committee on Elections No. 1, in the contested-election case of Kent v. Coyle. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the election case that we disposed of yesterday?

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the value of having it in the RECORD now at the expense of the taxpayers of the Nation?

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. It simply shows the ground on which the case was decided.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION IN BUSINESS

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by my colleague, Hon. JOSEPH B. SHANNON, at Kansas City, Mo., on May 18.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, on May 18, 1932, my distinguished colleague from Missouri, Hon. JOSEPH B. SHANNON, delivered an address at the Kansas City Live Stock Exchange in which he demonstrated that the Federal Government has forced its way into active competition with private business to an amazing extent. The Government's participation in private business activities was at first under cover, but now this competition is open and aboveboard, extending to a multitude of activities, to the serious injury of private industry. Mr. SHANNON showed that in many instances the small retail merchant sees his business shrink and his profits disappear by being deprived of trade to which he is justly entitled under our economic system and scheme of government.

Mr. SHANNON'S speech was published in the Kansas City Daily Drover's Telegram, a publication of wide circulation and great influence. This paper is owned and published by members of the Neff family, long identified with the livestock industry in Kansas City and the Middle West. The founder, or one of the founders, of the Drover's Telegram, the late Hon. Jay Neff, was one of the outstanding citizens of Kansas City, having with fidelity and honor served as mayor of that metropolis, and as evidence of his liberality and public spirit he gave to the Missouri University a beautiful and costly structure for housing the Missouri School of Journalism, the first and undeniably the greatest institution of its kind in the world.

As reported in the Drover's Telegram, Mr. SHANNON said, in part:

Twenty years ago Theodore Roosevelt said, "Opportunity must be preserved for the American youth."

To-day that statement should be amended to say, "Opportunity must be preserved for the American citizen," and the only way that this may be done is for the Government to be driven out of competition with private business, JOSEPH B. SHANNON, Representative in Congress from the fifth congressional district of Missouri, declared in an address yesterday afternoon at a meeting of livestock men in the exchange hall.

"We hear a good many speakers nowadays talking about paternalism in government, and that is all right," Mr. SHANNON said, "but I want to get down to every-day terms and talk about laundries and restaurants. I want to show how the large Government store at Leavenworth, Kans., has entered the retail field and has murdered the private merchants in Leavenworth.

"Opportunity is being taken away from private citizens more and more each day by the encroachment of the Government through bureaus, commissions, and boards. We must clean house in the Government and throw the bureaus out the window. When that is done the private citizen will have the opportunity to which he is entitled. The way to do it is to convince Congress that the Government may be operated without the elaborate system of extravagant bureaus that has been built up. The majority of Congressmen want to do what is right, and it is up to the people of the country to let their sentiments be known."

Mr. SHANNON cited a number of instances where the Government has come into direct competition with private individuals in the operation of restaurants. He said the Government had spent $100,000 on a cafeteria in the new $17,500,000 "temple of folly" at Washington. He referred to the Department of Commerce Building.

Coming closer to home, Mr. SHANNON told of the plan to include an expensive Government-operated restaurant in the new post-office building now being erected in Kansas City, when there are several other restaurants in the union-station district, privately owned and operated, which should have the business, and which have protested against the post-office restaurant. He said he understood the Government contemplated putting restaurants in the post offices of 32 cities in the United States.

SPECIAL ROOMS FOR OFFICERS

"I recently visited the Federal reserve building in Kansas City and found a restaurant on the top floor," Mr. SHANNON said. "There was another large dining space that they told me was for clerks. A smaller room to one side was for the bank officers, and they told me that still another room was being furnished for officials of the new Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

"In Washington they tell us it is the welfare department of the Government that provides all of these services for the Government employees. Through the welfare department the Government has even gone into the bootblack business. But it isn't for the welfare of the employee that it is done, but for the welfare of the fellow that is selling supplies in big lots to the Government.

"Of late there has come to Washington a strong protest from private operators of laundries in the country that Government competition has been ruining their business. There is a striking example of this under the very noses of the Congressmen. The laundry of the families of Army officers in Government offices is picked up by soldiers in trucks operated at Government expense, taken to Fort Myer and cleaned, thus taking the business from private laundries. This is bad enough, but what makes it worse is that the officers are accommodating many of their friends by pitching their dirty clothes in the bag, too. I asked some officials at the capital under what department this was being done and they replied, 'national defense.'"

Mr. SHANNON'S attention has been called to the competition of the Government with the retail merchants of Leavenworth when a group of men from that town told him how their business was being ruined. He sent his secretary to Leavenworth to investigate.

He exhibited to the meeting purchases the secretary had made at the Government store. First he showed several packages of cigarettes.

"These were purchased by a citizen of Kansas City and not by an Army officer," he said. "The cigarettes cost 15 cents at the Government store, while the drug store across the street was compelled to charge 17 cents, including the tax levied by the State."

He held up a bottle of perfume, a necklace, a necktie, and a pair of woman's pajamas. What an Army officer would need with these things was more than he could understand, he declared. Furnaces, silverware, and radios could also be bought at the Government store.

IN THE RADIO BUSINESS

"I am told of a recent instance of a citizen of Leavenworth taking a radio from the store of a private dealer for a week's trial," Mr. SHANNON said. "At the end of the week the dealer went to the home to see about it. He was informed that the man liked the radio after the trial, but that he bought one at the Government store for $5 less than the dealer's price."

Mr. SHANNON spoke of the difficulty citizens encountered in gaining a hearing by officials of the Government at Washington.

"The Capital is a long way from the people," he said. "Recently a delegation of Kansas City livestock men were in Washington seeking a hearing before the Agricultural Committee of the House, and they had to wait from Monday until Thursday before they were heard. These men found they had been accompanied from Kansas City by two strangers, and investigation revealed the strangers were representatives of the Farm Board.

"Why were these men shadowing the delegation?" They were afraid of the same thing that every Government bureau employee is afraid of. They were afraid of being dislodged from the Government pay roll."

Mr. SHANNON spoke at the livestock exchange at the invitation of a petition signed by some 300 persons. He delayed his return to Washington for a day in order to accept the invitation. He was introduced by J. C. Swift.

He has submitted to the House a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee of five men to thoroughly investigate the operations of the Government in competition with private business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in the RECORD a letter from Hon. Frank Murphy, mayor of the city of Detroit, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and also to print in the RECORD a petition which is attached to the letter and which is addressed to the President of the United States, signed by the mayor of the city of Detroit and the mayors of other cities in Michigan, asking for relief and detailing conditions in the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if we are going to start putting in letters and communications from various mayors, we should put them all in. I understand this is just a communication from the mayor of the city of Detroit?

Mr. RAINEY. And numerous other mayors, and it is addressed to the President of the United States.

Mr. MICHENER. It is a petition from the mayor of the city of Detroit and a number of other mayors?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MICHENER. And it is locally confined to the State of Michigan.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I received a copy of it and I did not offer it because of the rule which the gentleman from Illinois has heretofore insisted upon, that petitions of this kind have no place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am wondering why his change of heart?

Mr. RAINEY. This is a petition of importance, and it is official and it is addressed to the President of the United States.

Mr. SNELL. If it is addressed to the President it should be sent to the President and not to us.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GUARANTY FUND FOR DEPOSITORS IN BANKS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up a privileged resolution, House Resolution 221, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. To-day was to be Calendar Wednesday, ordinarily, with the Committee on Labor having the call. I would like to know what our status will be.

The SPEAKER. To-day is not Calendar Wednesday, because by a resolution adopted yesterday it was dispensed with.

Mr. CONNERY. When will we have our Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. On next Calendar Wednesday. Every Wednesday is Calendar Wednesday.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11362, a bill to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire any time on the rule?

Mr. PURNELL. I have had no requests for time. I have no disposition to oppose this rule. I do not want to be misunderstood in not opposing the rule. I will be frank and say that I do not know how I shall vote on this bill myself. It is very controversial, and it is a matter of such importance that we feel there should be ample opportunity for discussion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, if there is no desire for time, I move the previous question on the adoption of the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-two Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. Cox, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11362) to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11362, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the first section of the bill provides that the minimum capital for national banks hereafter organized shall be $50,000, and requires that a surplus fund equal to 10 per cent of the capital shall be paid in contemporaneously with the payment of the capital stock. The opinion is so general and the view so widely expressed that this provision is desirable that I shall not discuss it at length. Records show that 60 per cent of failed banks have capital not in excess of $25,000. This does not afford proper protection for creditors and depositors.

The next provision in the bill relieves stockholders in national banks from liability to assessment upon their capital stock. It has been found in practice that only 5 per cent of deposits is realized out of collections against stockholders through assessments of liability upon capital subscribed, and only 16 per cent of the realizations upon assets of insolvent banks are received out of the assessment liability against the stockholders.

The effect of the existing provision of law is to give stockholders who are on the inside, so to speak, an opportunity to avoid their liability by disposing of their stock when they find trouble about to overtake a banking institution, and leaves at a disadvantage the investor on the outside, the citizen of the community who is carrying stock in his local bank as a matter of community pride and community service as well as for any return he expects on his stock.

Instances are not infrequently found of stockholders who leave their estates carrying investments in the capital stock of banks, and the heirs, assuming they have a valid asset in such holdings, allow the matter to drift. Finally the bank gets in trouble, there is failure, and the widow or the children find that instead of having inherited an asset, they have inherited a liability and often a lawsuit which works great hardship and injustice. So long as this provision remains in the law, the public is not going to invest money in bank stock.

The enlarged requirements for capital stock is a direct method of affording the protection which double liability is designed to afford but which in practice has failed to afford depositors and creditors of banks.

Another provision of the bill requires Federal reserve banks to give immediate credit for checks drawn against them by their member banks. Under the present rules checks drawn by member banks against Federal reserve banks are not paid, but payment upon them is deferred for the time required for the checks to be cashed, or the time which the Federal reserve bank estimates is required for the collection of checks. It is a cumbersome, unworkable, inconvenient plan, and results in hardship to member banks, and especially smaller banks in marketing periods of the year when demands for cash and balances are accentuated and when it is difficult to finance the marketing of crops.

Another provision of the bill prevents any member bank of the Federal reserve system from paying more than 4 per cent on deposits. That is an arbitrary figure. I am not prepared to say no other figure would answer as well, but certain it is if other provisions of the bill are to be enacted into law we should have a maximum limitation on the interest to be paid on deposits. In the absence of such a limitation a weak bank, or a poorly managed bank, would have an advantage over the sound institution or the one that is prudently and conservatively managed. So, unquestionably there should be some limitation upon the interest rate to be paid.

Another provision prevents a member bank from paying any dividend on its stock until the surplus equals 25 per cent of the stock and then allows 6 per cent in dividends to be paid so long as the surplus remains above 25 per cent and under 50 per cent.

When the surplus exceeds 50 per cent, a bank is permitted to pay 8 per cent in dividends, but no more than that until the surplus reaches 100 per cent. When the surplus reaches 100 per cent of the capital stock, permission is given to pay whatever dividend is deemed proper and desirable, so long as it does not reduce the surplus below 100 per cent of capital stock.

Under the present law Federal reserve banks either place to their surplus account or pay into the Treasury of the United States in lieu of a franchise tax the earnings that accrue, after first having paid a return of 6 per cent to member banks, based on the capital which member banks hold in Federal reserve banks.

The bill before us provides that after paying the returns to member banks fixed in the law and setting aside an annual surplus of 10 per cent, Federal reserve banks shall distribute to their member banks half the earnings that accrue, to be prorated upon the basis of stock held in Federal reserve banks by member banks, and that the other half of the net earnings shall be paid into a fund known as a guaranty fund for the protection of depositors in banks that are permitted under the bill to share in the guaranty fund provided.

Let me say in connection with the provision regarding the distribution of earnings of Federal reserve banks that a great hardship has resulted upon the smaller banks that are members of the Federal reserve system in not being permitted to share in the earnings of the system. The Federal reserve banks make their money out of their member banks. The member banks are required to subscribe for capital stock in Federal reserve banks, each member bank subscribing an amount equal to 6 per cent of its own capital. Upon that an arbitrary return of 6 per cent is paid and no more. The member banks are required to maintain balances amounting to 7 per cent on regular deposits and 3 per cent on time deposits with Federal reserve banks, and upon those deposits member banks do not get one dollar of return.

Prior to the passage of the Federal reserve act the smaller banks of the country maintained their balances with large banks in the cities with whom they carried their accounts and received an interest return upon those balances amounting usually to 2 per cent or 3 per cent. In addition to this, member banks were permitted to charge for the service rendered by them in collecting and remitting checks.

That privilege has been taken away. This was done by overriding the expressed will of Congress. The history of this would be interesting but not pertinent to this legislation, because there is no provision in this bill that would change existing conditions and practices.

I have pointed out these instances of hardship affecting the smaller banks of the country in order that you may see the desirability of permitting member banks in the Federal reserve system to share in the earnings of Federal reserve banks. Part of the earnings of these banks has been paid into the Treasury in lieu of a franchise tax, but Federal reserve banks do not owe the Government any franchise tax. They render more service to the Government than they receive compensation for. The provision for paying a part of net earnings into the Treasury of the United States was simply an automatic method devised when the Federal reserve law was passed by which to absorb any possible earnings that might accrue. It was never expected that Federal reserve banks would accumulate any large earnings. They were not designed to become money-making institutions, but the fact is, notwithstanding enormous expenditures in salaries—and I think I shall not be considered unjustly critical when I say unjustified and extravagant expenditures incurred in the erection of costly buildings—the Federal reserve banks have made in round figures $526,000,000 net profits. That fund has either been paid into the Treasury of the United States—and something in the neighborhood of $150,000,000 has been paid into the Treasury of the United States in lieu of a franchise tax—or it has gone into surplus accumulations of the Federal reserve banks.

It is not unfair to say that while these enormous earnings were being accumulated out of member banks of the Federal reserve system hundreds and hundreds of those member banks were choked down. They were prevented from earning sufficient profits to enable them to carry on, and a large part of the difficulties that have overtaken banks that are members of the Federal reserve system has grown out of the exactions and discriminations against them either as written into the Federal reserve law itself or resulting from the administration of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman suggest that the Government should not receive compensation for the use of its credit—that is, the credit extended by the Government to the Federal reserve banks? The gentleman will recall that in one section—I believe it is section 16—it is provided that when Federal reserve notes are issued the Federal reserve banks shall pay such interest as may be assessed by the Federal Reserve Board, which clearly, to my mind, shows the intent in the original act that the Government should receive compensation for the use of its credit.

Mr. COX. May I supplement the gentleman's question?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. In other words, the Federal reserve system was an agency set up to serve the entire country. The gentleman proposes by this bill, as I take it, to dedicate it and its activities to the benefit of the national banks of the country and to the national banks alone.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. As I understand it, it is the purpose of the committee to offer an amendment at the proper time which will equalize the initial fee of the State banks and the national banks, is it not?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that that question will more properly arise when we reach that provision of the bill under the 5-minute rule for consideration of amendments. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that the provision to which he refers has never been used, as far as I am informed. I hope the gentleman will not allow me to spend too much time on a mere detail of this bill. I have great respect for the gentleman's judgment, and I appreciate his interest, but I want to get along to the things that are really controversial in this bill.

Mr. PATMAN. It is not a mere detail. It is using the Government's credit, and the question is whether it should be paid for.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say there were two schools of thought in connection with the writing of the Federal reserve law. One was to permit the banks to issue the currency. There was another school of thought that held it was the function of the Federal Government to coin money and regulate its value, and that the Government should not surrender to the banks this sovereign right and duty. It was out of this contention that the provision went into the Federal reserve law that required the Government to stand back of notes issued by Federal reserve banks. The bill does not change the practice that obtains and has obtained since the enactment of the Federal reserve act.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], I hope the gentleman will do me the courtesy to read the bill——

Mr. COX. Let me say to the gentleman I have read the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is in error and I assumed the gentleman had only read the first bill which I introduced and which did limit the provision for protection of deposits to member banks of the Federal reserve system. A second bill, the one now before us, does include State banks in the plan for the protection of depositors.

Mr. COX. As the gentleman happens to know, I have read the bill and I recall its provisions. I know it was not the intention of the gentleman's committee to destroy the State banking system of the country; but if it had been the express design of the legislation to bring about that result, the gentleman could not have done more than is promised by the legislation that is now proposed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman now permit me to answer his question?

Mr. COX. Of course.

Mr. STEAGALL. I want to say to the gentleman that I assumed he might not have read the last bill. The bill now before us provides for a guaranty fund for depositors, not only in national banks, but depositors in State banks as well, and it was to that fact I desired to call the gentleman's attention. We are not attempting to limit the application of these funds for the protection of depositors in national banks or to member banks of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to state that the bill I have read is the bill for which consideration was provided by a rule from the Rules Committee?

Mr. STEAGALL. I thought, perhaps, the gentleman had confused the two bills.

Mr. COX. No; I have not confused the two bills. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a further question?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. In section 202 you simply provide insurance to depositors at the expense of the Government, provided you concede that the Federal Reserve Board is a Government agency and that its earnings belong to the Government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Let me answer the gentleman from Georgia a little farther. I want to say to the gentleman again that every dollar of stock in the Federal reserve banks and every dollar of deposits in the Federal reserve banks comes out of their member banks, just such banks as make up the banks of his community and of mine, and their earnings come out of operations with these banks, out of their capital stock, and out of rediscounts with those banks, except such as they may make in open-market operations which they are permitted to conduct under the Federal reserve law. This is how they get their money. There is not a man whom the gentleman can offer as an authority on Federal reserve legislation who will stand up and say in this House that the earnings of the Federal reserve banks ought to go into the Treasury of the United States. I will say to the gentleman that in another body there is a gentleman for whom we have great respect and for whose ability we have the deepest admiration who is not in sympathy with the main provision of this bill, but that gentleman stated on the floor of the Senate during recent discussions that in good morals and in fairness not one dollar of the earnings of the Federal reserve system ought ever to have gone into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman permit me to ask if the member banks have not gotten value received for every dollar they have paid into the Federal reserve system?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that one reason banks have closed their doors in his district and in mine is because under the operation of the Federal reserve law they are no longer permitted to charge for the service they render in remitting checks to the large banks and wholesale houses in cities, for which service they used to earn thousands of dollars a year. Any banker in your district will support my contention.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is not contending that the loss of that revenue——

Mr. STEAGALL (continuing). And they are not getting above 6 per cent return on their stock in the Federal reserve banks, though in normal times they make much more than that, and they are not getting a dollar of return on the deposits which they carry in Federal reserve banks, and upon which, until the passage of the Federal reserve law, they were accustomed to collect from 2 to 3 per cent throughout the year.

Mr. COX. The gentleman, of course, is not seriously contending that the loss of revenue of the national banks that are members of the Federal reserve system, by reason of not being able to collect exchange for remittances on checks, is responsible for the bad condition of banking throughout the country.

Mr. STEAGALL. There are a lot of things that enter into the calculation when we go to cast up the whole account to ascertain all the difficulties in the banking world. There are a lot of things that enter into that. I am only pointing out some of the things that have played a part in bringing us into the trouble we are in now, and these things to which I have referred have played a big part——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman will recall the statement of the president of a bankers' association who appeared before us against this bill, who stated that the deprivation of the right to collect this exchange had deprived the banks, on the average, of a 6 per cent dividend, which in 15 years amounts to 90 per cent.

Mr. STEAGALL. They all agreed that the average bank, such as we have in your community and in mine, was accustomed to making, out of their charges for the services which they rendered in remitting checks to big banks and the wholesale houses, enough annually to constitute a fair return on their capital stock. The Congress voted on this proposition, and both Houses voted for an amendment to the Federal reserve law specifically denying the right to Federal reserve banks to prevent member banks from making reasonable charges for this service. The Federal reserve banks finally succeeded in requiring member banks to render this service for nothing. It has a lot to do with breaking down the independent banks of the country.

Mr. COX. Reverting to the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], does it not mean that so far as the national banks are concerned the Federal reserve system has been a curse rather than a benefit?

Mr. STEAGALL. I am not cursing anybody or any system. I am using a lot of time that I did not intend to use, because I want to discuss the main provisions of this bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I note on page 11 that there shall be paid into such fund by the Treasury an amount equal to the entire sum heretofore paid to the United States as franchise tax by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am coming to that. This brings me to a consideration of the main provision of this bill, the provision for protection of deposits. Let me explain that provision. The bill creates a liquidating board to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and three members to be appointed by the President who shall administer a fund for protection of deposits. The bill provides a guaranty fund in the following manner: First, we take out of the Treasury $150,000,000, which is substantially the amount that has been paid into the Treasury in lieu of a franchise tax by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman will permit me to finish——

Mr. HARE. I gather from the gentleman's statement that a fund went into the Treasury that was not legally entitled to go there, and I assume that the gentleman is going upon the assumption that this $150,000,000 should have gone to the original member banks of the Federal reserve system and is now held in trust by the Treasury Department for their benefit, and the gentleman seeks to use it as a part of a fund to guarantee deposits?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is a little in error. The fund was not paid into the Treasury illegally. The law provided that method of absorbing the earnings of the Federal reserve banks. It is not being held for member banks, but it has been paid into the Treasury. I will say there is no disagreement among men whose opinion the gentleman would accept that that fund does not of right belong in the Treasury of the United States. If the gentleman will read the debates in the Senate on the subject, he will find that I am amply borne out in the statement that I made, by the contention of Members who are regarded as highly informed, and as to this all of them are in agreement.

Mr. HARE. I want to clarify my statement. If I used the word "illegally," I did it inadvisedly, because I know that the law provides that it should go there; but, as I understood the gentleman, while it went there under the law, yet in obedience to good conscience and equity it really did not belong there but belongs really to the member banks of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. STEAGALL. Absolutely; and the provision for payment into the Treasury was put in the law purely as an automatic method of absorbing the earnings, if there should be any, though it was not expected there would be.

Mr. BLANTON. But I understood the gentleman to say that it did belong in the Treasury, where the Congress provided it should go.

Mr. STEAGALL. Has the gentleman heard my statement?

Mr. BLANTON. I have been listening to it all the time, and that is the meaning that I drew from it.

Mr. STEAGALL. I said it was paid into the Treasury legally but not rightfully.

Mr. BLANTON. And if by the passage of the gentleman's bill he can guarantee all deposits of our constituents all over the land, he will do more to restore confidence over the country than anything else that we have done in this Congress.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I suggest that the gentleman be permitted to explain the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Just one moment. Let me answer the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE]. Not only is it true that there is no disagreement that these funds in good conscience belong to the member banks of the Federal reserve system and to their depositors, but the administration is now committed to the passage of a bill that is now pending in the Senate, receiving support on both sides of that body, which provides that funds may be loaned depositors in banks that are closed and that the funds to be loaned shall be made up in part of the fund that has been paid into the Treasury of the United States by the Federal reserve banks; and they do not stop in that bill at a provision for the payment of those funds back to depositors in member banks of the Federal reserve system, out of whom the profits were made, but that bill provides for the loaning of funds to depositors in State banks for the purpose of releasing frozen deposits and in trying to afford relief to communities that have suffered the horrors of bank failures. In passing, I will say that that bill ought to be enacted into law before this Congress adjourns.

It is not my bill; I did not originate it. I am not its author, but it is one of the suggestions of the President of the United States and ought to be enacted into law before Congress adjourns. I do not know why it is not being put forward.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. In a moment. Not only that, but the bill to which I refer, which has the approval of the administration and the sanction of the Comptroller of the Currency and the approval of Members on both sides of the Senate, has in it also a provision for taking part of the surplus funds of Federal reserve banks that were accumulated out of member banks and that those funds shall be used not only for the relief of depositors in closed banks in the Federal reserve system, but it provides for the use of those funds for the relief of depositors in State banks. The bill also provides for taking funds out of the Treasury for the same purposes. Is not that so, Mr. McFADDEN?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. As to the $150,000,000 which is originally paid as a Federal reserve bank franchise tax, that money has been dissipated and paid out of the Treasury, so that if the Treasury must pay that back into this fund, the taxpayers of the Nation would have to defray the expense of the $150,000,000. Am I not right in that conclusion?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is correct, unless the bill should provide, as could very easily be done, for reimbursement to the Treasury of that fund. I do not think the Treasury should be reimbursed. I do not think they should ever have taken one dollar of the earnings of these banks. I say that one of the reasons that depositors in your district can not get their money back out of member banks in which they deposited it is because those funds have been paid into the Treasury of the United States and into the surplus funds of the Federal reserve banks. These earnings should have been shared with member banks. It is generally admitted now that that should be done.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Would it not be agreeable for the gentleman to proceed without interruption, because many of us have connected statements to make?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes. I must finish. There are other Members who want to discuss this bill and I must conclude.

Now, that is how we obtain the initial fund of substantially $300,000,000. We get $150,000,000 out of the surplus fund of the Federal reserve banks. We get $150,000,000 out of the United States Treasury that was paid in in lieu of a franchise tax. Then the bill provides for the assessment of $100,000,000 against member banks of the Federal reserve system, to be prorated on the basis of average deposits, and that State banks may be permitted to apply for the benefits of the guaranty fund and be admitted upon the payment of a double assessment of the amount assessed against member banks.

The deposits in national banks and State banks last June were $56,000,000,000. They declined. In the member banks there is something like $21,000,000,000, and there is $30,000,000,000 in nonmember banks—about one and one-half times the deposits in State banks that are in the national banks and member banks.

That last provision should certainly raise at least another $100,000,000, which would give something around $500,000,000 initial guaranty fund.

Then there is a provision that the board may borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and pledge its future accretions to its guaranty fund for the repayment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which would provide a potential fund of more than $1,000,000,000.

Then there is a provision for levying annually $100,000,000 against member banks of the Federal reserve system and assessing State banks annually the same as member banks, to keep up their annual assessments, which should constitute another $100,000,000.

The bill provides that the assessments against the Federal reserve banks, assessments against member banks, and assessments against State banks shall only be called for when and as needed, and as against the banks it shall be collected in installments of 25 per cent. Any funds above $500,000,000 may be deposited with contributing banks as deposits without interest.

The bill provides that when a bank is insolvent or closed, the board appoints a member, the stockholders a member, and the depositors a member of a committee, who shall assess and determine the value of the assets of the bank. Ninety days is allowed under the bill within which to do that. At the end of 90 days the board is required to pay not less than 50 per cent of all deposits that do not exceed $1,000, and 25 per cent on all deposits that exceed $1,000; six months later they are required to pay not less than 50 per cent additional to depositors whose deposits are not above $1,000, and 25 per cent to other depositors; six months later they are required to pay not less than 25 per cent to all depositors, and six months later to pay all depositors in full. That gives 21 months within which to meet the requirements. Of course, it is not contemplated that that time would be used. In any ordinary bank failure that would occur the board would take over the bank, appraise its assets, and tell people to come and get their deposits. That would not happen many times until bank failures would be ended in that community.

But if a large bank were to fail there would not be any shock to the guaranty plan. In 90 days the board would take the cash and liquid assets of the bank and pay the first installment. Six months later the board would have collected from the assets of the bank enough to meet another installment, and certainly not before the time for the third payment would there be any need to make draft upon the guaranty fund, so that there would not be any substantial demand in case of a big bank failure against the guaranty fund until 21 months from the time the bank closed. During that time there would be the initial fund of $1,000,000,000, and $200,000,000 more that could be assessed against the banks that enter into the plan.

The records show that from the foundation of the national banking law in 1863, down to 1930, the total losses of all deposits in national banks and in member banks of the Federal reserve system amounted to only $82,000,000. That was the testimony of the Comptroller of the Currency and it is in the record of hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House.

I have the figures here, but I shall not take the time to read them. The records show that for the 11-year period, 1921 to 1931, inclusive, the total deposits involved in all bank failures—State and National, member banks and nonmember banks—amounted to only $1,200,000,000 in round figures. Net losses to depositors could never amount to more than one-fourth or one-third of deposits.

So this bill would provide a fund sufficient within the first year of operation to enable it, without being required to borrow a dollar from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and without having to assess a dollar against member banks or nonmember banks, to pay all losses that have accrued to depositors in all the banks of this country during the 11-year period from 1921 to 1931, inclusive, and still have nearly $1,000,000,000 available to meet future contingencies. That is the kind of fund we have. It is ample to meet all demands. That would avoid the difficulties encountered in States that attempted to set up systems for the protection of deposits. Those attempts were unsuccessful because the unit was too small; the banks were dependent upon 1-crop farming and the risks were too concentrated. Charters were granted banks indiscriminately; supervision had not been developed to proper standards. These failures, of course, constitute no valid argument against a plan for the banks of the entire Nation.

During 11 years deposits involved in all closed banks were $1,200,000,000. I do not refer to losses but to deposits during those 11 years. The records show that we do not collect less than 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent out of the assets of banks that are closed. For nearly three-quarters of a century net losses were only little over $1,000,000 annually.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEAGALL. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. MAY. That figure includes more than 2,000 bank failures that have occurred recently up to the end of 1931.

Mr. STEAGALL. I have not looked at the figures for the moment.

Mr. MAY. It is something over 2,300.

Mr. STEAGALL. The figures are substantially correct.

Mr. MAY. I was going to suggest the exact figures are given in one of the speeches of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEAGALL. I have them all here.

Mr. MAY. The figure was given in the gentleman's argument on the Glass-Steagall bill in presenting that bill to the House, and the figure stated was 2,394 banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is substantially correct, and I thank the gentleman for giving the figures. There is so much of this I am forced to desist from going into detail, as much as I should like to do.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Is it the gentleman's idea in this way to make the deposits in the poorly managed banks as safe as those in the well-managed banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman think the Congress of the United States should confess to the world that it is going to be content to allow banks to operate in which citizens can not safely deposit their money?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I asked the gentleman a definite question.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am asking the gentleman from Massachusetts a question, too. I am going to answer his question, but I would like for him to answer my question.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I would like to ask one further question.

Mr. STEAGALL. Let me answer the one the gentleman has just asked.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. STEAGALL. I want to answer the gentleman. I take pleasure in answering him.

Of course this bill will not stop all bank failures. No legislation is going to stop all bank failures. It is not going to stop all our troubles in the economic world. I am not offering it for that purpose. But in answer to the gentleman I will say that the bill does provide for a more stringent supervision of banks.

There is a provision in the bill which authorizes the Comptroller of the Currency, when he finds that an official of a bank for any cause is not serving that bank in a way that is safe for depositors and creditors of the bank, to cite such an official to appear before the liquidating board, giving him the right to appear with counsel; and if the board decides his continued connection with the bank as an official is not promotive of the best interest and safe management of the bank, the board is authorized to require the removal of such an official.

Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman not also in this bill taken away one of the safeguards that now exists in the national-banking system, supposing the bill were adopted; is not the double liability of stockholders taken away, thus the doing away with their additional responsibility in supervising the management of the bank?

Mr. STEAGALL. Did not the gentleman hear what I said about double liability?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I heard what the gentleman said.

Mr. STEAGALL. I regard the double-liability feature as an immaterial matter compared to the essential part of the bill, but I will repeat that the double liability has proven to be a deception to the public rather than a protection of the deposits intrusted to banks where the double liability laws obtain. A widow or minor who inherits bank stock finds the bank stock has subjected her to a suit in court for the amount which the bank stock purports to convey as an asset.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Also, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. STEAGALL. Wait a minute; I have not finished answering the gentleman yet about poorly managed banks.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. That is what I want.

Mr. STEAGALL. Where does the gentleman think the poorly managed banks are, may I ask him?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I am not answering questions.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman seemed to have a definite idea about poorly managed banks. I just wanted to see what the gentleman's thought was in order that I might be in position to address myself to his question intelligently.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will permit, I may develop it a little further. If this bill makes no distinction in the safety of deposits in the poorly managed bank as compared with those in the well-managed bank, what incentive is there for any man to deal with a carefully managed, prudently managed, wisely managed, honestly managed bank if his funds will be just as safe deposited in a poorly managed, imprudently managed, badly managed bank?

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman think the public takes no more interest in it than that?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. It strikes me this is a very important thing if the bill serves to encourage poor banking.

Mr. STEAGALL. I have just explained to the gentleman that, on the contrary, we provide a more stringent method of supervision. I ask the gentleman, if the outstanding men of intelligence and ability in the banking world are compelled to enter into a system, having regard for the welfare of the commerce and industry of the whole people, as we required them to do when we forced them to join the Federal reserve system—if we bring them into this plan, does the gentleman think that their liability to the depositors of this country would not result in some effort on their part to improve banking methods and banking conditions throughout the United States? I am sure the gentleman would not say that such a thing would not result.

Now, let me say this to the gentleman: This bill is founded upon the most universally accepted and established principle known in the economic life of the world to-day, the principle of insurance. That is what it is founded upon. Every time you pay a premium on your life insurance you are made to contribute to the widow of a man who was killed in the San Francisco earthquake or who died during the yellow-fever epidemic in New Orleans. Every time you pay a premium on fire insurance on your home you contribute to the payment made by the fire-insurance company to the scoundrel who burns his home next week if he has obtained insurance on his home.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if the life-insurance companies and fire-insurance companies to which he has referred are Government companies or private companies?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have told the gentleman that we apply to this bill a principle that is accepted by the economists and business men everywhere throughout the civilized world. You talk about bank officials. They will not let a man be an officer in a bank unless he gives a bond through an insurance company that he will honestly and prudently conduct the business of the bank. You make him give a bond that he will not steal the funds of the bank. Does the gentleman contend that the requirement that a man give a bond against theft makes him steal more than was stolen before?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. But the gentleman is not speaking about private insurance when he is discussing his bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am talking about the principle of insurance that is applied everywhere. You apply it to your automobile, and gentlemen out West apply it against storms. You insure yourself against your own carelessness and negligence, and the banks themselves will not loan a citizen a dollar on his home until he goes and insures it against fire. You would not loan a citizen the money with which to erect a Chic Sale structure down on a branch without requiring insurance against fire! That principle is universally applied. The Government will not risk a deposit in any bank without insurance. So it is with States and counties and all public funds. They all require insurance. Banks never fail to demand insurance on loans to other banks. Everybody is protected except the public. Their business is to furnish the money!

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. The information which a great many Members desire is in reference to the restrictions made in section 208. If the State banks are not permitted to come in under the guaranty provision, it will put the State banks out of business.

Mr. STEAGALL. The bill permits State banks to participate in the plan and it is agreed by members of the committee that we shall liberalize that provision. There will be no trouble between the gentleman and myself about that.

Mr. GARBER. This limits State banks to a capital of $25,000. There are many State banks with capital of less than that amount. I would also like to ask the gentleman if he believes the State banks throughout the country would be able to pass the strict supervision and examination required.

Mr. STEAGALL. I know what the gentleman has in his mind. I will say to the gentleman that when I first introduced the bill I thought the plan for protection of deposits should be applicable to national banks and member banks of the Federal reserve system, but when I began to study the proposition I found I had been misled as to the losses that have accrued to depositors in State banks. Then I amended the bill so as to let in State banks. When we get to that provision of the bill under the 5-minute rule I shall be glad to join the gentleman still further in any provision that will liberalize the law with reference to the admission of State banks in a way that I am confident will meet his approval. Now, let me make this statement——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has consumed one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may use as much time as he desires of the time at his command.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. I made a study of the question and I found that the total amount of deposits in nonmember banks that closed during the 11-year period from 1921 to 1931, inclusive, is less than the total deposits in member banks that failed during that time. It was a surprise to me. That is true notwithstanding the fact that State banks, nonmember banks, carry deposits equal to one and one-half times the deposits that are carried by member banks of the Federal reserve system. That is why I assure the gentleman I shall be glad to join in liberalizing the provisions of this bill with respect to the admission of State banks into the system for protection of deposits, because it will be greatly to the advantage of the system to have those banks in with their larger deposits and smaller losses to absorb the burden and contribute to the accumulation of the guaranty fund.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Has the gentleman such an amendment to offer?

Mr. STEAGALL. We will offer it at the proper time.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman print the amendment in the RECORD?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not have it ready, but there will be no difference between us on that point.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Has the gentleman at his tongue's end the amount of deposits in these banks that failed, the member and nonmember banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. During that time from 1921 to 1931, inclusive?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is now asking me to go into details, which I did not want to do, but it was $957,000,000 in nonmember banks, and $733,000,000 in member banks. However, $119,000,000 were involved in deposits in member banks that reopened and $344,000,000 were involved in nonmembers banks that reopened. So that there were in member banks liquidated $614,000,000 deposits, and in nonmember banks liquidated $613,000,000—and this, notwithstanding nonmember banks had about one and one-half times the amount of deposits that member banks had. This is all shown by Federal reserve bulletin of April, 1932. So that we find the amount of deposits in State banks that failed is less than the amount of deposits in member banks.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. STEAGALL. I must get through. I regret I can not yield, but I must save time for other Members, and I hope the gentleman will later have an opportunity to express himself on this bill.

I simply can not cover all these matters as I should like to, but before I conclude let me say that loss of confidence is the worst factor in the distress that has come upon our country. Very little money is used in commerce. Ninety per cent of business in this country is done with bank credit and checks. We are concerned that our currency shall be solvent and its integrity preserved. Why are we not concerned with banks with which nearly all business is conducted? The integrity and solvency of checks on banks is indispensable to business, order, and prosperity. There are only five and a half billion dollars of what we call money in this country, and only $1,000,000,000 of that in cash in the banks of the country with which to support $50,000,000,000 of deposits. The other four billion dollars or four and a half billion dollars is out among the people, and it is agreed that at least one and a half billion dollars or two billion dollars of cash money that ought to be in the banks and employed to support credit and commerce and industry and agriculture is in hiding under mattresses, in tin boxes, in stockings, and buried under the homes of citizens who are afraid to trust their money on deposit in the banks of the Nation, for whose regulation and safe supervision and management you and I are responsible to the people of this country.

This is the situation in which we find ourselves. It is undermining our prosperity, lowering the price of commodities, and bringing distress to the treasuries of the Nation and of the States. It is disastrous to commerce. It has crippled industry and crushed agriculture. This state of fear is not limited to the public, to farmers, merchants, manufacturers, or other classes of citizens. Bankers are afraid. They live in constant fear of a withdrawal of their deposits.

So they have now in the neighborhood of $10,000,000,000 of assets that are liquid and entitled to rediscount at the Federal reserve banks and these funds are idle and unemployed while business is paralyzed, causing distress, suffering, sorrow, even death among the citizenship of the Nation. The situation is unworthy of this great Republic, the clearing house of the world, this Republic, to which the world looks for leadership. You and I owe a duty to the people of this great commercial commonwealth and to the world.

We can not have a general revival of business, we can not have a complete recovery from the conditions under which we suffer, until normal banking is resumed in the United States, and it is not going to be resumed until the public who furnish the money with which the banks do their business, take their money out of hiding and put it back in the banks, in order that it may supply the basis for an enlargement of deposits, an expansion of credits, an increase in values. This would enable debtors to pay their debts, and increase incomes for the support of the Government. It would restore a normal return from tax payers and put an end to the difficulty experienced in the effort to balance the National Budget. Every interest cries to us for relief from existing conditions.

The citizenship of the country desires and demands this legislation. They know where their interest lies and they understand that the purpose of the legislation is to afford them protection sorely needed and long denied. If Members do not believe this, I invite them to call at the rooms of the Banking and Currency Committee and let me show them my correspondence. I say to you frankly that in all my long service as a Member of this House I have never seen such universal support of any bill offered in Congress, and it is spontaneous and uninspired. It represents a voluntary appeal, born of suffering and distress, and it comes from all classes. I conscientiously believe that it represents the best thought of bankers themselves.

I know the campaign that is being carried on by a few big bankers against this measure. I know the methods they have employed. I expect to say more about this before consideration of this bill is concluded. I have the record to show that a few big bankers in Georgia came here to oppose this legislation and went back home urging bankers not to send telegrams or write letters but to have bankers call on Representatives in person to urge defeat of this measure. The big bankers clamored for legislation giving them access to $2,000,000,000 of Treasury money to relieve them from results of their follies and mismanagement. We passed the legislation to save the Nation from threatened disaster. The only justification for it that can be offered has been the service rendered in preventing bank failures. Members who voted for that legislation voted for guaranty of bank deposits and out of funds to be supplied wholly by the Treasury of the United States or for which the Treasury of the United States is made responsible. That guaranty plan involves directly the Treasury of the United States.

Bankers who insisted upon that legislation and are enjoying its benefits are now lobbying against this bill which provides a sound method of deposit protection, placing the burden upon the banks of the country where it belongs. It is a measure which, had it been enacted earlier would have saved Congress from the necessity for passing legislation to save the banks at the expense of the Nation's Treasury. These same bankers are now lobbying against the bill now before this House. Members who desire may follow them. I will not. For one, I am going to meet my responsibility to the people of the Nation by giving support to the passage of this legislation that will at least contribute to the recovery of business and the return of prosperity throughout the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL].

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, my opposition to this bill is chiefly directed to the provision that seeks to guarantee bank deposits.

I do not believe that this is a practical proposition. The idea has been tried out in several different States and, so far as my knowledge goes, has always proven to be a disastrous failure. We have just passed through what is perhaps the most critical period that our banking system has ever encountered. Banks in large numbers have failed throughout the country, big banks as well as little banks have failed, and in most every instance these failures have been the result of bad management, or at least due to the lack of conservative banking methods.

After the war the banking industry was expanded by leaps and bounds. Many banks were organized where there was no need of these additional banking facilities, and these banks failed because there was not business enough to keep the bank alive, especially when the depression came. But these conditions may never occur again, and I do not believe that the Congress should, in a moment of hysteria, pass banking laws, revolutionary in character, that will have a tendency to upset the well-established banking system throughout the Nation.

Up until the war it was an almost unheard-of thing for a bank to fail, and I predict that as soon as a readjustment in the banking system has been made, banking conditions will be as safe as they ever have been in this Nation, and it is much better to have this accomplished in the natural way than to have it forced by unnatural laws.

When you guarantee bank deposits by law, you immediately penalize the honest and conservative banker for the mistakes made by bankers who are not conservative and even at times reckless in their negotiations. There never was a better time for Congress to take a common-sense view of propositions of this kind, and I hope that the bill will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I think it right and nothing but fair to the committee, and especially to the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, that I gave notice when I voted to report this bill out of the Committee I reserved the right to change my mind, if I reached such a conclusion, and to vote otherwise in regard to the bill. This is one of the most important bills that has come before this Congress, or that has been acted on up to date, and it deserves the serious consideration of every Member of the House of Representatives, whether he votes for it or votes against it. It is more or less embarrassing to me, because it is the first time in my experience in Congress that I have differed with the chairman of our committee, whether Mr. McFADDEN, chairman when the Republicans were in control of the House, or my friend, Mr. STEAGALL, whose friendship I esteem and whose ability I admire in the highest degree.

The guaranty-deposit fund provided for in this bill is a protection against loss to depositors of national banks and State banks members of the Federal reserve system. Notwithstanding that Congress has no jurisdiction of State banks not members of the Federal reserve system, section 208 of the bill undertakes to give protection to depositors of such banks under conditions and stipulations therein provided.

However, there is no provision in the bill which proposes to take care of State banks not members of the Federal reserve system with a capital of less than $25,000. There are a number of banks throughout the United States, particularly in the agricultural sections, which have a capital of less than $25,000 and therefore they are excluded from the protection provided for in this bill.

It virtually outlaws every private bank and State bank not in the system throughout the entire United States.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. In response to a question that embodied the gentleman's objection, the chairman assured the Members that he would be favorable to an amendment to section 208 which would lower the requirement of admission of nonmember banks to an amount of capital that would include them all and liberalize the other requirements in regard to inspection, so that all could become members.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Gentlemen can talk that way about it and feel that way about it, but it is not in this bill. The law now is that no bank can become a member of the Federal reserve system unless it has a capital and surplus of at least $25,000.

Mr. GARBER. The bill provides, as I understand it, that nonmember banks may be admitted for guarantee purposes only, and not be required to go into the Federal reserve system. Is not that correct?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. With the proviso that the banks are given two or three years to get ready to go into the system, and also with the proviso that they pay twice the tax other member banks have to pay.

Mr. ALMON. What percentage of State banks are now in the Federal reserve system?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am going to tell you that.

As of December 31, 1931, there were 6,368 national banks in the United States, 878 State banks members of the Federal reserve system, and approximately 14,000 State banks not members of the Federal reserve system. In the State of Georgia, for instance, there are 258 banks located in the agricultural sections which are not members of the Federal reserve system, 50 of which have only $15,000 capital.

We are asked to support a bill which requires 7,246 banks to take care of losses to depositors of 14,000 other banks located in every State in the Union. I respectfully submit for your serious consideration that these 7,246 banks should not be taxed and held responsible for the losses to depositors in all the other banks of the United States. Why require the banks in North Dakota and Minnesota, for instance, to pay the losses of depositors in insolvent banks in the States of South Carolina, Alabama, or Georgia? Why should the stockholders of the banks of Georgia be responsible for the losses sustained by failure of the banks in Michigan; or why should the banks in Chicago be taxed to pay the losses to depositors in insolvent banks in New York? I contend there is no justice or equity in requiring banks in one State to pay the losses sustained by depositors in failed banks in another State, or to tax banks in one section of a State for the purpose of taking care of the losses to depositors in a bank located in another section of the State.

As the proposed legislation covers every State in the Union, I think the guaranty fund should come out of the Treasury of the United States, and, if necessary, by the issuance and sale of bonds; and if the bonds are not sold, same to be given to the Federal Reserve Board for issuing notes against them, provided the accumulated franchise tax is not sufficient for this purpose, so that every taxpayer of the country will, upon a reasonable and sensible basis, bear his proportion of the losses to depositors and share equal credit for doing so, instead of putting the burden upon the 7,246 member banks. I believe in the doctrine and the principle that depositors should be protected against loss, but I do not believe that the solvent banks should be forced to carry the whole loss.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Georgia five additional minutes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. In 1926 I introduced a bill for this purpose. At that time the Republicans were in control of every branch of the Government, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] was then the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

The bill I introduced did not provide for an assessment against the national banks and the State banks members of the Federal reserve system. It contained no provision which taxed banks to pay any part of the guaranty fund. It did not tax a State bank in the system or out of the system one single dollar. There was no assessment upon any bank in order to make up the guaranty fund. I introduced it for two or three different terms after 1926, but I could never get a hearing, because the Republican administration then in power was opposed to such legislation, and it died without the benefit of clergy. The distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was the ranking Member and his right bower was the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], the present chairman. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] was opposed to it, just as he is now. All the administration and everybody connected with the administration was opposed to this bill, and they are all opposed to the Steagall bill. If you can show me a recommendation from Secretary Mills or Governor Meyer or any member of the Federal Reserve Board or the Comptroller of the Currency in favor of this bill, I will be willing to take my seat and not discuss the bill further.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who is in favor of it, other than the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Three-fourths or four-fifths of the Committee on Banking and Currency reported it out; and it may pass. I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, it is not a unanimous report?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes. It was a unanimous report, with reservations.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the reservation of a bludgeon on the part of some to attack its very vitals as being not sound financially or governmentally?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the gentlemen tell what this law will do to the State banks.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. It will put them out of business; that is what it will do.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.
